the college students who they can be paired with.

"We have a big jump when the students get back," he said. "We went from 137 kids in July to 206 right now."

Volunteers at the program will spend a few hours a week with their little brother or sister doing activities they both enjoy. Scroggs said mentoring a child for at least one year is very important.

"Studies show that if you have a mentor and you only put them together with a child from 0-6 months, you really have done a worse job than if you never would have touched the child," he said. "The reason being, someone else has let them down, and now they feel you're doing it too."

Aside from one-on-one matches, Big Brothers-Big Sisters offers several other different types of matches. It offers anything from married couples being matched up with a child, to an entire family taking care of a child.

Scroggs said all people can put their children through the program, which does not cost the parents.

He said Big Brothers-Big Sisters sets up fund-raisers throughout the year to raise money for operations.

While some children are fine without Big Brothers-Big Sisters, Scroggs said it is important for people to realize which children are going to require the mentoring program.

"It's not like we believe every child needs to be here," he said.

"but there are those children that are not getting some of the support they need to develop the assets that will help them to go through life and do it well."

Speer said she has learned that even spending a small amount of time with her little sister has made a difference in her life.

"Getting to know her has been rewarding," Speer said. "Paying her attention and giving her love and friendship is such an important thing."

anytime soon."

According to the ICSC survey, 49 percent of all respondents used the word "disappointing" to describe the upcoming holiday season. The next highest response was "fair" with 35 percent of the votes, leaving 16 percent of respondents saying "poor" and zero percent saying "good."

Respondents were provided a space to explain their one-word characterization. Some said their choice was a result of declining consumer confidence and uncertainty surrounding the possibility of war.

Despite these reports, local store owners are still optimistic about the holiday shopping season.

"I'm anxiously optimistic," said Michael Pusker, store manager at J.C. Penney. "Sales didn't drop over the Thanksgiving weekend, and I think people are going to rally together and get closer to their families. I think it will be good."

Oldfather said what might be good for the country might not be in the best interest of every individual.

"Some may feel they need to be patriotic and take their money and plastic to the malls and spend," Oldfather said.

"However, there are going to be people unsure if they will be able to keep their job, or their bonus, and spending more may be risky to them."

"People need to be sensible with their money. If we all become too tight with our cash, it won't help the recession. But we can't expect people to do things that will be risky to their financial security."

special education, recalled Donley's skill in working with children.

"One past memory I have is from last week when he taught middle school students," she said. "He worked with a student who could not read very well, and he was so respectful of her."

"I watched how he worked with this student, and he prompted her a bit with encouragement and with modeling and with respect," Navarette said.

Harris regretted that Donley would never fulfill his goal to be a teacher.

"I feel bad for the profession that he is not going to be out there," he said. "He would have been an excellent teacher."

Donley was a member of the Alpha Gamma Rho fraternity. Fellow member John Green recalled his quirky side.

"He had a Winnie the Pooh bag he wore to class," he said. "And on St. Patrick's Day, he dressed as a leprechaun. He always had funny antics."

"Lance was caring, and he was one that always tried to help get everything finished," said Dr. Steven Harbstreit, associate professor of secondary education. "He was an outstanding individual that will be sadly missed."

Feelings of both regret and gratefulness accompanied those who knew Donley.

"I didn't get to know him well enough," Harris said.

"The way I see it, we were so lucky to have known him," Navarette said.

"The outcome targeted North Third and North Fourth Streets, South of Bluemont to Leavenworth, as a potential redevelopment area," he said.

The Walgreens would begin the process of providing redevelopment of the Third and Fourth street corridor as a continuation of the downtown area and do it in a way that was compatible to adjacent neighborhoods, Cattell said.

This redevelopment plan may also pave the way for new businesses to join the Manhattan community, including Target. According to Target spokesman, Brie Heath, the company is interested in Manhattan for a potential site, but nothing has been planned yet.

"Our real estate representatives look at 200-300 potential sites each year, nothing is sited in Manhattan just yet," Heath said.

KSU receives doses of influenza vaccinations

BY MICHAEL WATSON
Kansas State Collegian

Lafene Health Center has received 600 more doses of influenza vaccines.

"If it's anything like the first 150 we received, they're going to go fast," Clarice Holmes, clinic coordinator, said.

Holmes said a priority for the first shipment was given to high-risk citizens due to the possible nationwide delay of vaccine distribution according to the Kansas Department of Health and Environment.

"We still urge people that were in the high-risk group to come in to get vaccinated, but it is not limited to just them," she said.

Holmes said the vaccination process is quick. People wanting vaccinations must pay first at the business office. Then they take the receipt to the immunization room.

"There is a 20-minute wait after the

Flu shot availability

Flu injections will be given from 8:30 to 11:30 a.m. and 1 to 4:30 p.m. Thursday and Dec. 6 on a walk-in basis. They are available to any K-State student, faculty or staff member who wishes to be vaccinated. Cost for the vaccination is $7 for students and $10 for faculty and staff.

injection. That is the longest wait," she said. "By the time they pay and come back, we run them through pretty quickly."

There are 650 more doses coming, but Holmes said she does not know when Lafene will receive them.

Holmes said Lafene always is concerned about the flu season, but the virus is unpredictable. She said getting a flu vaccination will help students battle it.

"There are different strands, so you can still get the flu, but it won't be as severe as if you didn't get the vaccine," she said.

Kansas to gain new district lines

BY JOHN HANNA
The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Legislators are behind schedule in redrawing their own districts, but some believe they were too optimistic in predicting how quickly they could move on the politically charged issue.

The Special Committee on Redistricting began a two-day meeting Tuesday at the Statehouse. Its 34 members quickly broke into small groups, along party and regional lines, to discuss House and Senate districts for parts of the state.

The new district lines are supposed to reflect population shifts documented in the 2000 federal census. Johnson County and the Wichita metropolitan areas are likely to gain power, while southeast and northwest and north-central Kansas could lose clout.

The 15 House Republicans who serve on the committee hoped to have a proposal for new representative districts finished by Wednesday. The committee's eight Republican senators thought they would have a plan ready for Senate districts within three weeks.

The committee originally planned to have proposals ready for a vote Tuesday, so it could forward its maps to the entire Legislature, which convenes Jan. 14. But any votes by the committee aren't likely until its next meeting, Dec. 20 and 21.

Earlier this year, the committee established deadlines in hopes that the Legislature could deal with redistricting quickly. In 1992, partisan and regional bickering delayed passage of redistricting bills long enough that the state had to move its candidate filing deadline from June 10 to June 24.

But members said behind-the-scenes discussions among legislators about their districts have taken longer than anticipated, as did congressional redistricting in September and October.

"I don't know if we ever truly thought we could get it all done (Tuesday)," said Rep. Mike O'Neal, R-Hutchinson, the committee's co-chairman.

Senators typically acquiesce on proposals for redrawing House districts, just as representatives are supposed to stay out of Senate redistricting.

Eight Democrats from the House and three from the Senate serve on the committee, but they can do little more than argue publicly if Republicans are united on a plan.

Democrats are in their weakest position on redistricting in 40 years. The GOP 30 of 40 Senate seats and 79 of 125 in the House, and Gov. Bill Graves is a Republican.

In 1972 and 1982, Democrats Bob Docking and John Carlin were governor; in 1992, Democrat Joan Finney was governor, and her party had a 63-62 majority in the House.

In their first discussions with each other, Republicans were up-front about their desire to draft plans that help Republican incumbents retain their seats and make it easier for the GOP to capture open seats.

Comical communicators

Theatrical group uses humor to send message of health

BY ADAM LEE

Kansas State Collegian

College life and all the problems that accompany it were spotlighted Tuesday night.

"Tiger by the Tail," a theatrical group that addresses issues that affect students on a day-to-day basis, was featured in the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

The performance was sponsored by Sexual Health

Awareness Peer Educators, S.H.A.P.E., as part of a week of events devoted to the upcoming World AIDS Day.

"Tiger by the Tail" is a group of students from Emporia State University who focus on peer education through acting. The group writes and performs skits that depict young people in difficult situations.

Through a combination of humorous and dramatic dialogue, the performers explore subjects ranging from substance abuse to superficiality.

Group member Pete Hardy said that through laughter they can expose people to subjects they might not normally talk about because they are personally or even embarrassing issues.

"Humor keeps the audience involved," Hardy said. "Then you can have a really dramatic ending."

Jokes were intermingled with information such as what to do if you have been sexually assaulted, resources for people with mental health problems and how to properly put on a condom.

"Tiger by Tail" member Mandy Shirk said she thought students could better appreciate the message their skits try to convey because often times they are based on the members' own experiences.

"I think that they can relate to us more on a personal level because we are students," Shirk said.

Shana Kerstetter, senior in family studies and human services, said she wasn't expecting the performance to be so comical and said she thought the group's style was effective in addressing serious social circumstances.

"They presented the information that they needed to, and it was also very entertaining,"

Kerstetter said.

The S.H.A.P.E. organizers said they thought "Tiger by the Tail" fit perfectly with their groups mission of increasing student awareness of sexually transmitted diseases.

"We want to teach our fellow students about healthy lifestyle choices, and we've learned that peer education is very efficient in doing that," said S.H.A.P.E. member Amy Mauk, senior in family studies and human services.

Mandy Shirk acts out the role of an unknowing victim about to be attacked by a stalker, portrayed by Pete Hardy, on Tuesday in the K-State Student Union Ballroom. The theatrical group, Tiger by the Tail, performed skits representing issues college students face such as campus safety and sexually transmitted diseases.

Hidden job market might be answer to college grad frustrations

BY ALYSON RALETZ

Kansas State Collegian

Corporations will hire 19.7 percent fewer 2001-02 college graduates than they recruited from last year's graduate pool, according to the National Association of Colleges and Employers' survey, Job Outlook 2002.

"Employers have indicated they are looking for more experienced candidates," said Tim Henderson, associate director of Career and Employment Services.

"In any time when there is a downturn in the economy, it's basically a buyer's market for employers. They have the luxury of looking at more experienced individuals."

Still it is beneficial for employers to look at hiring new college graduates, Henderson said.

"There are still a number of employers and companies that continue to recruit college graduates because they value and put an emphasis on having a fresh perspective," he said.

Between 10 and 15 companies, though, have either postponed or canceled this fall's on-campus visits.

While some companies already have submitted offers to candidates, he said others are experiencing hiring freezes, layoffs or a reduction in their recruiting budgets.

"I would like to emphasize that many of them have strongly indicated that they will be back on campus. If not this spring, they should return in the fall," he said.

Erin Galvin, senior in anthropology, plans to move to Arizona after she graduates this December. She has not found a job yet, but is pursuing human resources positions, Galvin said.

With a tight job market, she said she is not expecting to find her dream job immediately after graduation.

"I have bills — it terrifies you," she said.

"There are always jobs out there, though. It may not be something you necessarily want to do, but there's always something. You can't expect the perfect job to fall in your lap."

Companies should not cut back on their college recruiting, she said.

"I can't think of a valid reason they wouldn't hire more graduates," she said. "I think they are missing out on a variety of people and the new ideas that would be coming in."

She said she understands companies are looking for more experienced individuals, but she hopes ageism does not become an issue.

"I have worked my way through college, sometimes 40-60 hours a week," she said. "I have experience. Just because someone is older might not necessarily mean they have more experience than me."

Henderson said students should be aware of the cutbacks and start their job searches early.

"This requires immediate attention," he said. "This is not something that should be put off. It will require a greater level of diligence, persistence and creativity."

"For the past several years, college graduates have been extremely fortunate in having a healthy economy. There have been a lot of visible opportunities available to them."

Newspaper advertisements and Internet searches are examples of visible opportunities. Students need to go beyond this simple job-searching and utilize the hidden job market, he said, which is mainly based on referrals from people within the business.

He said the hidden job market accounts for two-thirds of all available job opportunities.

"In a poorer economy, students need to start networking with as many people as possible to tap into that hidden job market that is never publicized or advertised," he said. "A lot of employers don't advertise positions because they don't want a slew of responses from unqualified candidates."

"They prefer to have a referral from someone that knows the candidate. That's why networking is a crucial part of the search."

The outlook

The National Association of Colleges and Employers conducted a survey, Job Outlook 2002, from late July until mid-August. Survey results revealed that employers expect to hire 19.7 fewer 2001-2002 college graduates than 2000-2001 graduates.

The Good News

■ 39.9 percent of employers plan to continue their college hiring at last year's levels.
■ 30 percent plan to employ more graduates than during the 2000-01 academic year.
■ Government and non-profit organizations should boost their recruiting by 20.5 percent.

■ The job market should be strongest in the South. Employers plan to cut hiring by 7.3 percent.

The Bad News

■ 30 percent of employers plan to decrease college hires.
■ Service employers plan to cut back hiring by 24.2 percent.
■ Manufacturing companies plan on hiring 30.1 percent fewer grads in 2002 than in 2001.
■ The job market should be weakest in the West. Employers plan to cut hiring by 44.8 percent.
■ The Northeast and Midwest project cuts similar to the national average, 19.7 percent.

Liz Black utilized the hidden job market when her high school and college internships landed her a position as an engineer working on aircraft engines for General Electric in Winfield, Kan.

Black, senior in mechanical engineering, said she did not have to go through a formal application process, since her previous employers approached her with the offer in August.

"I was very relieved," she said. "Finding a job was not something I liked to think about. It's difficult to see my friends struggling, though, trying very hard to find jobs and coming back with not-so-desirable results."

She said there are about 30 mechanical engineering majors graduating this December. She said about four have found jobs, and seven are pursuing graduate school, but the rest still are job-searching.

"There are lots of people going out on interviews, but not many people are getting offers," she said. "There are not nearly as many openings. A lot of offers were made over the summer during their internships, too."

She said General Electric was eager to hire her because she had seven to eight months experience in the specific position, and her learning curve would be short.

"Overall, I have spent 18 months with the company," she said. "The company has invested a lot of time in me. For it to receive a return, it needed to bring me back long-term."

CAMPUS IN BRIEF

Union information center offers computer access

Students now can check their e-mail, watch TV, read the paper, search the Internet, use the telephone and see what's happening on campus all at one central location.

The campus information center, on the ground floor of the K-State Student Union, has been up for about a month and a half.

Union Director Bernard Pitts said the response has been positive.

"Fantastic," he said. "There's always someone down there on a computer. As people become more familiar with it, it becomes more used."

K-State's center is one of 24 across the country. The stations, designed by the California-based company Campus Link, are made especially for college campuses.

Advertisers pay for spots on the screen, which funds the center. Students do not have to pay for anything, Pitts said.

The center includes six Gateway computers, maps of the campus and the Union, room reservations in the Union, brochures for different groups and events on campus and 200 free copies of the Topeka Capital-Journal each day.

Pitts got the idea for the campus link after visiting UCLA's Student Union, which had the first one in the country.

"We tried to bring into one location all the information someone would want on campus," he said. "It's the only semblance of information on campus."

The televisions have been especially helpful recently, Pitts said.

"After Sept. 11, everyone was interested in what was going on in the world," he said. "We had our TVs turned to CNN."

STATE IN BRIEF

Hepatitis A cases decrease; last occurrence Oct. 26

HUTCHINSON — Encouraging results from aggressive immunization campaigns have health officials hopeful that hepatitis A outbreaks are under control in Hutchinson and Great Bend.

"Oct. 26 was our 88th case, and we've had none since then," said Judy Seltzer, director of the Reno County Health Department in Hutchinson. "I can't yet say it's totally over, because we need to go past the 50- or 60-day time limit for an exposure to show up. We're looking pretty good at this point."

In Barton County, it's been two weeks since the last case occurred.

Lily Atkins, director of the Barton County Health Department, said the county confirmed 13 cases of hepatitis A since the outbreak began in May.

"We're holding our breath that this is over," Atkins said.

The immunization campaign was aimed at those most at risk of contracting the liver disease—primarily users of illegal drugs.

Danger increases as war takes change in Mid East

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The stepped-up pace of the war inside Afghanistan also means increased risks: A CIA operative remains unaccounted for, five soldiers are recovering from friendly fire and more casualties are likely with Marines on the ground.

In addition, the enemy is so dedicated to its cause that fighters are willing to have hand grenades wrapped around themselves and blow themselves up, so they can kill a half-dozen other people in close proximity, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said.

The thought that they'll surrender, Rumsfeld said, is not likely.

The increased danger was apparent Tuesday as some of the 600 Marines already setting up base at a remote southern airstrip began to set out on patrol in Humvees loaded with anti-tank weapons and heavy machine guns.

Transportation Department want checkpoints efficient

WASHINGTON, D.C. —

Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta wants to whisk airline passengers past security checkpoints in 10 minutes or less.

As the Transportation Department prepares to take over passenger and cargo screening at the nation's airports, Mineta said he wants to avoid long waits.

"Our goal in passenger screening is no weapons, no waiting," Mineta said Tuesday. "We will strive to develop a screening process that prohibits weapons or other banned materials—without requiring a waiting period of longer than 10 minutes."

Mineta also said the department wants to screen air cargo without delaying a plane's departure and plans to have several thousand air marshals on flights by June 1.

Survey implemented to evaluate advising

BY RYAN DONAHUE
Kansas State Collegian

Students who enrolled for the spring semester online through KATS during the past few weeks were introduced to the university's first attempt to evaluate the effectiveness of the academic advising system at K-State.

A simple nine-question survey was put in place on the KATS system. The survey was the product of the K-State Advising Enhancement task force appointed by Provost James Coffman.

The goal of the survey—and the task force—was to come up with an effective mechanism where student input could be collected on a regular basis, Mike Lynch, associate vice president, said.

The survey was placed on the KATS system two weeks prior to the beginning of spring enrollment. It was only accessible online, and completion of the survey was not mandatory for enrollment. The completion rate for the survey exceeded Lynch's expectations.

"It's a tremendous data base. It beats a mail survey totally. By the end of the week, we will have approximately 14,000 students who completed the survey out of 18,000," Lynch said.

Any students who missed the online survey by using other methods of enrollment will be e-mailed the survey in the coming weeks. Lynch said he believes they will have up to an 85-percent completion rate by the end of the semester.

Initial concerns of the KATS system being overloaded by the survey proved to be false.

"To my knowledge, it did not prove to be a problem. I only received one e-mail from any student who had trouble with the survey. Out of the 14,000 survey entries, only 250 students opted out of the non-mandatory survey," Lynch said.

Crystal Borhani, sophomore in marketing, said she thought the survey was too simple.

"The questions were too basic," Borhani said. "If you had issues with your adviser, you would have taken it up with them already."

Borhani said she believes the mandatory advising appointment can prove to be more of a nuisance than an aid.

"It kind of screwed me up. I was late in getting my appointment and ended up missing my enrollment date by a few days," she said.

Lynch said the effectiveness of an adviser's role depends on what the student wants out of the session.

"If a student is wanting to receive advising on a career plan such as a five-year plan for their education, then it can prove to be a valued asset in achieving that goal," Lynch said.

"It is good to meet with your adviser, no matter what class you are in," said Robin Craig, graduate student in animal sciences. "They can remind you of some of the things most undergrads don't know about, like applying for graduation."

Craig earned her bachelor's degree at K-State and said she remembers when enrollment was a daylong affair.

"KATS is a lot easier. The old lines were awful. With the KATS system, you can enroll at home or in the K-State Student Union, and with the online catalog, you never even have to get up to enroll," Craig said.

Lynch said the reports of the data will be completed by late January or early February. Then, the task force will present an overall university report to the provost and college with college reports to each college head.

Individual department reports will be presented to each respective department head. All advisers with more than five advisees also will be eligible to have a personalized, anonymous report presented to them upon request to the associate vice president.

"Before this, there was no systematic way across the university to evaluate the adviser's role. Overall, we are very pleased with how smoothly it all worked on KATS. It was a success," Lynch said.

Bluemont students express sadness

BY SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

One young student at Bluemont School summed up the general feeling after learning her school would be closed.

"What am I going to do?" she asked Principal Lori Martin. "This has been my forever school."

Her response was not unusual. "We shed tears that morning," Martin said. "We wiped our eyes and made it a great day for our students."

The Manhattan School Board unanimously voted last week to shut down Bluemont and Eugene Field elementary schools in response to declining enrollment and looming budget problems.

Martin said many people were taken by surprise. "Folks didn't think it was a reality," she said. "It's a really harsh reality to deal with."

"It's been like a funeral home here. We've had parents come in to the office crying. We've had 14 flower deliveries."

For now, the staff is concerned with making things fun and normal for the students. The school won't be closed until June, and Dave Colburn, father of two Bluemont children, said it's important to maintain a healthy learning environment.

"It's going to be hard the next five or six months to keep the faculty riled up when they know their building is closing and they're going to another building," he said. Colburn, who lobbied the board to keep Bluemont open, said the community will lose a great asset by closing the school.

"There's something special here. It's not a number you can just quantify, though," he said. "It's an old building. Lots of steps. Lots of floors. We've got the cards stacked against us."

"What makes us special doesn't come across in those numbers."

But those extra steps played a big role in the final decision to close the school. Either Bluemont or Woodrow Wilson had to be closed, and the board cited the handicap accessibility as a major factor.

The building has four floors and no elevators. Almost all of Wilson is on one floor.

But the school has so much more to offer than its building structure, Lisa Stroble, president of the PTO, said.

"It's a pocket of excellence. It has great programs," she said. "It's touching a lot of kids — a lot of kids that need it."

Twenty percent of the students are minorities, and the school has the highest level of impoverished children in Manhattan.

Accommodating these students can sometimes be tough, but Martin said the teachers have done a good job of working with them.

"You have to be willing to work outside the walls of the school," she said. "Form relationships with the families."

Parental involvement and student volunteering are two things that separate Bluemont from other schools. There are 213 students and 239 volunteers, many of whom are K-State students.

The school has several

Bluemont also is the only school in Manhattan that offers free before- and after-school programs.

Because of its economic make-up and extracurricular programs, Bluemont receives about a half-million dollars in federal grants. Assistant Principal Jerry Armendariz said. He said he is not sure if the school automatically will lose those grants or if they can be transferred.

These programs help build students' characters, Stroble said.

"Bluemont is a place, while where it's definitely important to read," she said. "We want that no matter what role we have to play in the child's life."

The future of the Bluemont building has not been decided yet. It has been appraised at $632,000.

"There's the potential for it to be sold," Martin said. "It would be my hope that it would be used for educational purposes, though."

The board plans to redistrict Manhattan in December, so students should know what school they will be attending by January.

Stroble said she hopes Bluemont children can stick together.

"For a lot of kids, this is family. They've been together since kindergarten," she said. "The school and school programs are such a big part of some of the students' lives."

School board needs support during closings

We support the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 school district's decision to close Eugene Field and Bluemont elementary schools.

While the students, and parents and faculty might be inconvenienced by this verdict, we feel the school district made the best choice considering the circumstances.

Board officials said they voted to close the schools as a result of the declining enrollment during the last two years. Without closing the two schools, they would have lost $2 million and would have made serious program cuts throughout the district.

Board members said they chose the schools that would close based solely on the construction of the buildings and not the schools' performance levels.

We stand behind the board and its decision because although it might not appear so now, these cuts will strengthen the district. Underfunding is synonymous with education. This cut will channel the flow of money more effectively back into the school.

It is important for the community to stand behind this decision.

Knowledge boundary

Censored books deny reader valuable information; parents need to be monitors

I have always viewed a library card as a passport. It allows readers to go on adventures to places that are fictitious or factual — from the past to the future — all while remaining in the present.

Unfortunately, that passport that allows the wings of one's imagination to soar also carries a price tag — the occasional unjustifiable censorship.

Herbert N. Foer's book, Banned in the U.S.A., listed the 50 books that were frequently challenged throughout the United States in schools and public libraries in the early 1990s.

Some of those books included John Steinbeck's Of Mice and Men and The Grapes of Wrath. Also included were Madeline L'Engle's A Wrinkle in Time and poet Maya Angelou's autobiography, I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings.

According to the Web site www.booksatraz.com/censorship/banned.htm, Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm's Little Red Riding Hood also was banned, mostly because Red Riding Hood was carrying a bottle of wine in her basket.

Of course the list could not be complete without contributions from Samuel Clemens, a.k.a. Mark Twain. Two of his books, The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn and The Adventures of Tom Sawyer are some of the most banned books in history. The above-stated site pointed out that Twain wrote those books for adults, not for children. The site also mentioned those books often are banned because they are considered racist, even though they were written against slavery and racism.

Even 34 of the Modern Library's 100 Best Books of the Twentieth Century have been banned, or at least challenged, since their release. These include F. Scott Fitzgerald's The Great Gatsby and Anthony Burgess' A Clockwork Orange.

There is no need for censorship in regard to books. It represents the constraint of ideas. Author Judy Blume once said, "Let children read whatever they want and then talk about it with them. When parents and kids can talk together, we won't have as much censorship because we won't have as much fear."

With libraries and public schools still censoring books, it brings a sense of ignorance from our past. It is a way of establishing boundaries of knowledge that should not exist.

I remember reading a heavily censored book, J. D. Salinger's The Catcher in the Rye, as a sophomore in high school. It was shocking because it was so candid. The main character was a teen-ager named Holden. He did not use poetic words or optimistic phrases because it would have been out of character.

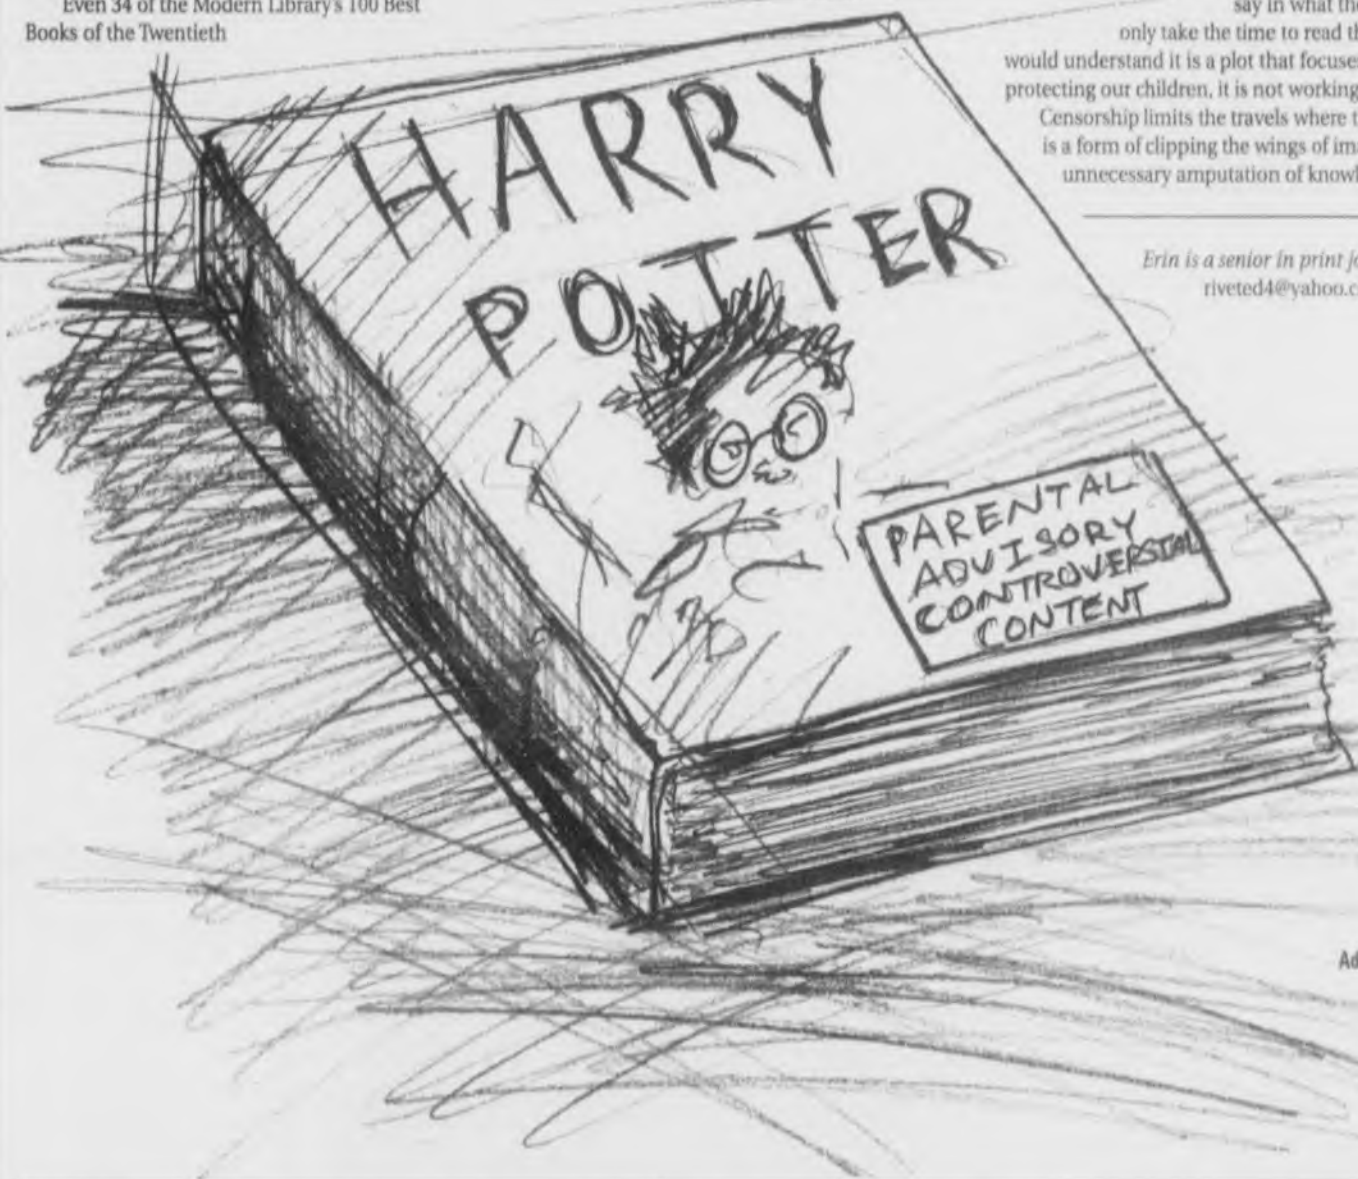

It was the first time I understood the main character of a book. Holden was real. His words were that of a teen-ager, lost in the confusion and chaos that is brought forth during the difficult time period of adolescence. Perhaps this frightened people, and so they censored this wonderful book.

Classics from the past are not the only books to be banned. Modern day literature is also being challenged. Last weekend I viewed "Harry Potter and the Sorcerer's Stone" with my family members, some of whom are elementary school teachers. They mentioned some of their students' parents forbid them to read any of the books or even see the movie because they deemed them inappropriate.

Granted, parents should have the final say in what their children view, but if they would only take the time to read these books or see the movie, they would understand it is a plot that focuses on imagination. If this is a form of protecting our children, it is not working.

Censorship limits the travels where the written word can take people. It is a form of clipping the wings of imagination and will result in the unnecessary amputation of knowledge.

New draft answer to distrust of government

I remember sitting and watching TV with my roommates Sept. 11. As images flashed on the screen, news organizations speculated what the nation's military response might be.

While the pundits droned on, one of my friends voiced what he thought would happen by uttering that hitherto unspeakable word — draft.

At the time, I thought the possibility of a national draft was unlikely. My reasoning was we hadn't had one since Vietnam, and public opinion is strongly opposed to the idea. Even the army, which initially fought doing away with the draft in 1973, is against it today. Besides, we fought the Persian Gulf War without the need for one. Why would this war be any different?

Thankfully for mothers everywhere, it doesn't look like we'll have a draft like the one used in Vietnam. This type of war calls for highly trained and specialized military forces, not an overwhelming number of troops.

Despite the necessity for one, I've been pondering the idea of a draft since then. President Bush and his administration have said all along this is a new kind of war. Perhaps what we need today is a new kind of draft.

The type of draft I'm supporting would have two goals. The first would be to meet the challenges of the current war. The second would be to instill in the nation's youth a permanent sense of national and civic pride.

This begs the question — what kind of draft do we implement that will accomplish these objectives?

A draft that gives people a choice to serve either in the military, as a member of homeland defense or as a part of a civil service organization, could accomplish the stated objectives.

The first choice is joining the military. This has been the purpose of every draft before and would have the desired effect of making sure we always had a sufficient army. Becoming a member of homeland defense is the second option. This could entail anything from serving on a rapid response terrorism team to a stint as a fireman or policeman. The last option, operating in a service organization, would expose people to the good works of community service.

Having choices does two important things. The first, is it allows those who are unwilling to serve in the military a way to do some other good. Second, it pushes people to get involved in government and civic careers they might not have even considered before. This involvement can create a lasting appreciation for community service and civil servants.

Why make people do community service or serve in the government? As David Gergen noted in his speech to the campus earlier this month, we treat our government today with an unhealthy amount of cynicism. While we hold up private industry as a glowing example of what's best in our society, we treat our government (and those who serve in it) as second-rate. By making people serve for a period of time in these roles, maybe we can squelch some of that cynicism and learn to appreciate our government.

Vietnam taught us a lot about what to do wrong in a draft. Mainly, it taught us not to have a draft of such inequality. Both wealthy Americans and those affluent enough to attend college could avoid service. Those who were less fortunate had to serve.

So how do we end this type of inequality? Simply make the draft mandatory. Have every American between the ages of 18 and 25 — black and white, male and female, rich and poor — serve for 12 to 24 months.

I realize this sort of thing would be hard to come to terms with initially, and it would be even harder to bring about politically. However, I think the benefits of what this type of draft has to offer potentially outweigh any burdens it might cause. As college students, we should support this type of idea should it arise in the near future in order to work toward creating a better America.

Energetic fans play role in success of basketball team

Editor,

In recent years, K-State football has been in the spotlight. However, not so very long ago, it was K-State basketball that drew the support of students, faculty and alumni.

When my grandfather attended K-State, fans packed Nichols Hall so full that people were forced to find seating in the rafters. In the early '70s, my parents attended K-State and cheered on the Cats in Ahearn Field House. My mom recounted a game against Kansas when the enthusiasm and rush into Ahearn was so great that my mom's feet never touched the ground as the students pushed their way through the doors.

It was at a K-State basketball game that the Wabash Cannonball was first played for the fans following the Nichols fire in 1968. In the heyday of K-State basketball, the fans never sat down during the games — not even during halftime. Everyone in Ahearn would cheer the Cats onto the court with the chant, "Bring On the Cats!"

Although the basketball program isn't what it was 20 years ago, I believe we have the coaching staff and athletes to regain a position at the top of the Big 12. This year's lineup, including the talents of our seniors (Larry) Reid, (Phineas) Atchison and (Travis) Reynolds and that of newcomers (Nick) Williams, (Gilson) DeJesus and (Pervis) Pasco, has what it takes to win games and provide fans with some amazing plays. The Wildcats are 2-1 in their season with 11 games to go.

It is said that an energetic crowd is the sixth man on the court. Anyone attending a K-State football game knows the team feeds off of the crowd and its thunderous cheering. If this is true for football, we need to help our basketball team out with our applause and cheers. With an increase in support for the Cats, there would be increased funding for the athletic department, which not only would help the basketball team, but also the many other sports programs at K-State.

As a student at K-State, I'm asking fellow students to go out and support the Wildcats. Season tickets are reasonably priced at $71 for 16 basketball tickets, which comes out to $4.44 per ticket. I think the entertainment of a basketball game is definitely worth the cost of a ticket. Every student who goes to a game makes a difference.

With few options for fun in Manhattan during the winter season, attending a basketball game is just what most students could use to break the boredom. Going to a basketball game is less expensive than most trips to Aggieville or attending a movie. Aside from providing something to do in an evening, attending a men's basketball game is an excellent way to show your Wildcat spirit. So please go out and give the Wildcats a chance to show you first-rate basketball by purchasing your season tickets for men's basketball.

Rep. Glasscock teaches political science class about budget

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Throwing Kansas budget burdens into the laps of K-State students, Kent Glasscock, Speaker of the Kansas House of Representatives, taught a political science course Tuesday afternoon in Waters 333.

"My speakership couldn't have come at a worse time," he said. "It's easy to govern when times are good, but it's hard when they're not."

"When times aren't good, we truly make decisions that change the next generations. We are forced to value certain programs over others."

Describing the backdrop to a current budget shortfall, he asked the students to solve the problem. He explained that during the legislature's spring session, representatives discovered they were $200 million short for their projected 2003 budget.

That is about a 7.5 percent decrease of a $4.5 billion budget, he said.

"We have significantly less money than we thought we had," he said. "It's been many generations since Kansas has seen this kind of problem."

He reviewed, dollar for dollar, certain program increases that

Kansas Legislature had to fund, such as Social Rehabilitation Services and public education versus program increases it would like to fund, such as higher education, special education and transportation.

"Given all revenue projections, if we take fiscal year 2002's budget and replicate it for fiscal year 2003 with no other increases than the $300 million we have to increase, and don't give anyone else anything, we still have to cut $350 million out of the budget," he said.

With the figures scratched onto the blackboard, the candidate for Lieutenant Governor split the class into three groups and accomplished in 10 minutes what the Legislature takes hours to do.

"I'm going to stop talking, and you're going to start figuring," he said. "This is the Tom Sawyer's method of governance."

"You have to cut $350 million or raise taxes."

He warned the students to be careful in which programs they cut because each decrease would have undesirable ramifications.

"There are no good options," he said. "All of the good options are gone. We will just have to package up all the bad options."

After 10 minutes, each group had decided to implement sales tax hikes to maintain program increases. One group suggested repealing Kansas blue laws allowing liquor sales on Sundays to generate more revenue.

Another group recommended cutting higher education and allowing the universities to make up for the cutbacks by raising tuition.

Glasscock said he appreciated many of their solutions.

"As you can obviously see, these decisions are really hard ones to make," he said. "When you have less money, you can't fund it all."

Elaine Gruenbacher, senior in secondary education, said she enjoyed finally being able to grapple with a real-life situation.

"It was cool that it was hands-on," Gruenbacher said. "It's not like looking at something from 10 years ago. This is something they are dealing with right now. After this, I have a much higher respect for what they have to do."

Michael Smith, assistant professor of political science, said he invited Glasscock to the class so his students would have the chance to interact with an actual policy maker.

"It exceeded my expectations," Smith said. "It goes nicely with what we were covering in class since we were talking about budgets. I just lucked out since I didn't ask him to discuss budgets."

He said he thought the students, with only 10 minutes, responded well to Glasscock's exercise although many of their solutions would not be feasible.

"In terms of public policy, a tax increase is not out of the question — maybe a little increase," he said. "But politically, it wouldn't go anywhere."

The students got a lot out of Glasscock's visit, he said, and if he has anything to do with it, it won't be his last.

"I appreciated that he came in here and treated us like knowledgeable people," he said. "We were surprised and got a look at how tough the budget really was."

Ancient Chinese sculpture donated to K-State, will be on display in Union

BY SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

K-State will receive one of 17 replicas in the world of a rare art piece from China.

The piece, which is a sculpture of a Terra-Cotta warrior protecting former Emperor Qin Shi Huang, was donated to K-State by Norman Brandeberry, who is a large contributor to K-State.

There will be a ribbon-cutting for the sculpture at noon Jan. 30. It will be permanently located on the ground floor of the K-State Student Union by the middle stairwell.

"China considers it one of its most important treasures," Union Director Bernard Pitts said. "It makes this fairly valuable and an important piece that we will be able to display here."

China does not allow the sculptures to leave the country, but it allowed 17 replicas to be made. K-State will receive the 14th replica. Former President Clinton owns the 17th.

More than 8,000 of the original sculptures were uncovered by peasants in 1974. Each statue is 5 feet, two inches tall and weighs about 220 pounds. It is estimated that it took about 720,000 laborers more than 37 years to complete the site.

The site was built for Huang, who ruled from 221 to 210 BC, as a burial ground. The soldiers were to accompany him in the afterlife.

It was considered one of the top archaeological discoveries of the 20th century and has been billed as the eighth wonder of the world.

History professor David Graff, who visited the burial ground in 1993, will present a short speech at the ribbon-cutting. He said the visit was memorable.

"I was just overwhelmed," Graff said on seeing the burial ground. "It's really fantastic."

K-State's sculpture will include an educational exhibit that explains the significance of the statue and the Qin dynasty. Most of the statues uncovered were regular soldiers, but the one K-State will receive is a general.

Having such a rare and historical art piece at K-State is quite important, Graff said. Hopefully, he said, students will take advantage of the opportunity to learn about this time period.

"I think it's wonderful," he said. "I was really excited. This is really something."

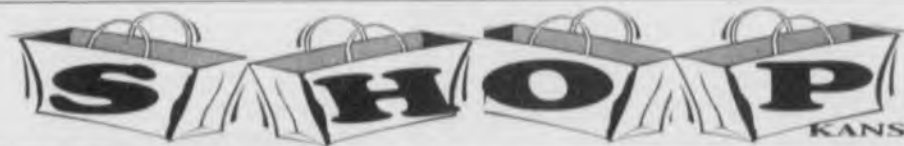

"It will make them think about China a little bit — its past. They can see something they're not used to seeing here."

The statue's unveiling will be a part of the Festival of Nations, sponsored by the Union Program Council. Chinese cuisine will be served, and there will be entertainment.

"It's targeting students," Erica Smith, multicultural coordinator for UPC, said.

"I think it's a good thing for K-State because it's such a cultural artifact that needs to be shown."

TURNING OVER A WIN

K-State tops Tennessee St. despite TO's, deficit during opening half

BY DEREK BOSS

Kansas State Collegian

Sloppy is defined as "messy; marked by carelessness."

And K-State fans got that English lesson Tuesday night in the Wildcats' 79-73 win over Tennessee State (2-1) at Bramlage Coliseum.

The two teams combined for 12 turnovers in the first eight minutes, and K-State (3-1) edged the Tigers, 19-18, for the contest.

"It was a strange game," head coach Jim Wooldridge said. "It was a frustrating game for me. It's really upsetting how we handled the ball and handled the situations. You expect better play."

But it looked to be that kind of night.

On the very first possession of the game, Gilson DeJesus' pass to Larry Reid was picked off by Tennessee State's Jeff Cooperwood, who took the ball the other way for an uncontested dunk.

Yet, the Cats — who outscored their opponent 42-18 in the paint — would overcome a six-point halftime deficit and mount two double-digit runs in the second half to get the important thing — a win.

forward Matt Siebrandt said.

"We didn't play very well, but a W's a W," he said. "Everyone always says that, and we'll take it."

The Tigers set the pace early, quickly pushing the ball up the court on offense and utilizing full-court pressure defense to force the Cats into their type of game.

"It's the tempo we had to play in, and you obviously saw a lot of problems," Wooldridge said. "I don't think they allow you to slow down. You call a set to slow it down, and the next thing you know, they're trapping you, and now you've got to play out of it."

"We keep telling our guys when you get in situations where the defense forces you into a quicker pace, you've got to make decisions and you've got to go attack. You can't play keep-a-way. You've got to go to the basket."

But K-State chose the keep-a-way approach most of the first half, and the Tigers built their biggest lead of the game at 10 with 1:30 to play, before two late Cat buckets would close the gap to 42-36 at the break.

"They were really scrappy with that trap," Siebrandt said, "and if you're not strong with the ball and making good passes and good plays out there, you're going to get turnovers, and that's what happened in the first half."

After the intermission, though — as has been the precedent this season — K-State would stage a comeback.

Down 47-37 at the 17-minute mark, a Travis Reynolds score inside sparked a 14-0 run for the Cats — holding the Tigers scoreless for nearly six minutes — to give the purple a four-point advantage.

K-State wasn't finished there.

Coming out of a Wooldridge timeout with 7:28 to play, the Cats expended another near-six minute run — this time, 13-0 — to gain the lead for good. Janerio Spurlock hit a three-pointer with 3:37 to go, pushing K-State up five, 67-62 — a shot Wooldridge said might have been the difference in the game.

Reid had a clear layup on the play, but kicked it out to the wide-open Spurlock, who drained the trey from deep in the corner.

"I just told him, 'I'm going to penetrate the ball, and follow me down to the corner,'" Reid said. "He did what I said. I hit him, and he hit the shot."

Reid followed that bucket with back-to-back scores, and the purple held off

Tennessee State down the stretch.

The Cats' point guard led the team in scoring for the third time this season with 18 points, while Spurlock chipped in 11 and Reynolds notched his first double-double of the year, posting 14 points and 10 boards.

Wooldridge's club also limited Kyle Rolston, the Tigers' leading scorer (23 pp to 1-of-11 shooting and just three points).

Reynolds said K-State expected a tough challenge from Tennessee State, especially since the Cats needed a Phineas (Tony) Atchison three-pointer last year just to send the game into overtime.

"This team came in here last year and did the same thing," Reynolds said. "It took Tony to hit a couple of shots for us at the buzzer last year to get the win, but it was a scrappy game. They didn't have nothing to lose, and they played like that."

Nonetheless, Wooldridge said his team knew the Tigers would be a quick, aggressive team, and the problems were just too frequent Tuesday night.

"It's not just handling the ball. It's decisions. It's poise," he said, "and we don't have a lot of that going on right now."

Close games becoming commonplace early in season with win over Tigers

BY SEAN PURCELL

Kansas State Collegian

K-State couldn't have been too worried trailing 42-36 at halftime Tuesday night — they had been in the same situation each game this season.

But, like two other times this year, the Cats stormed back and proved victorious in yet another close ball game.

"We were disappointed by the way we played going into half," freshman Nick Williams said.

"We felt like we couldn't keep playing that way."

Despite the shooting woes K-State experienced in the first half, the Cats sizzled coming out of the locker room, shooting 54.2 percent from the field.

Even though the turnaround produced a victory for the Cats, players and coaches still have concerns about the early season erratic play.

"We always seem to dig a hole for ourselves in the first half by being loose with the ball and not making the right decisions," senior Larry Reid said. "Down the stretch we dug a little deeper and found a way to win, but we have to find a way to put teams away in the first half so that we don't have to do that in the late minutes of a ball game."

K-State finally emerged from the six-point halftime deficit, and a 14-0 run early in the second half put the Cats up 51-47. The Cats would need a 13-0 surge late in the game to bury the Tigers for good.

Junior Matt Siebrandt said the team needs to focus on playing more consistently through both halves.

"We like 13-0 and 14-0 runs, but we don't want to have to go on those kinds of runs when we're down six," Siebrandt said.

"It's a trend we need to break because we aren't going to be able to do this against some teams."

For Williams, those teams are Big 12 opponents.

He said it will be important to correct the team's mistakes in the first half because if those same errors are made in January and February, the outcome will be different.

"If we are down like that in the first half of a conference game, there will be no coming back against teams like Kansas, Oklahoma and Texas," Williams said.

"So, we will have to figure out what is wrong and turn it around quick."

A consistent positive for the Cats has been the defense's ability to keep the team in each game. K-State has kept each of its four opponents to fewer than 37 percent shooting in the second half this season.

"Coach told us during halftime that we have to go out and play with confidence, and not play timid," Janerio Spurlock said. "We came out and played with a little more heart, and that was the difference."

One factor of K-State's struggles, head coach Jim Wooldridge said, has stemmed from the lack of production in K-State's offense in the first half.

However, he said he feels strongly that there's a definitive positive the team can pull from this.

"These are hard things to figure out, but the one constant thing that appears to be happening with our team that you can point to is that these kids are building a personality about their team that has some character to it — some caring — because this is frustrating to them, too," Wooldridge said.

"I'm over there on them, and the crowd is disappointed in them, I think — but they are rallying themselves and keeping their heads up, and that is a real positive because when some teams get down, they don't compete as hard. So there is something in there."

Wildcats
for football

Thanksgiving break is over. Eating turkey and watching digital cable at my parents' house was OK and everything, but being back at school means I get to study and walk to class in sub-arctic temperatures. Don't get too upset, though. There's less than three weeks until the semester is over.

David Plous

So in the spirit of the semester ending and grades being released, I am giving my grades for the football team, broken down by position. Offense is this week, defense goes next week.

Quarterbacks: C

This wasn't a great year to be a Wildcat signal caller. Success of previous quarterbacks proved hard to follow. Eli Roberson did show flashes of brilliance against Oklahoma and Nebraska, but struggled through the rest of the Big 12 games.

An ankle injury was part of the problem. Roberson's a great runner, but his throwing numbers — 39.8 percent — with eight picks and only four touchdowns are dreadful. You had to figure it would be hard for Eli to live up to the insane amount of hype he faced coming into the season.

Marc Dunn also struggled in his first year of Division I football. Billed as the better passer of the two, Dunn completed 47.9 percent of his passes, but matched Roberson's eight interceptions and four touchdowns.

Offensive coordinator Ron Hudson deserves some of the blame. Neither of the quarterbacks improved much over the season, which is reason to worry. Plus, the play calling could have been better. Roberson's ability to run makes him the starter next year.

Running backs: A+

K-State has one of the best backfields in the country. Josh Scobey, as expected, emerged as the star and had a career year. Just think how good his numbers would be if Hudson would have given him the ball more than 15 times against the Cats' three best opponents — Oklahoma, Colorado and Nebraska.

Rock Cartwright had a great year at fullback. I wish he would have gotten more touches. He was great last year on third down. He and Scobey will be in an NFL camp this summer. The emergence of Darren Sproles and reemergence of Joe Hall were exciting to see and gave the Cats a good change of pace in the backfield. But Sproles is the future.

Wide Receiver: C

Maybe we've been spoiled the last few years. Aaron Lockett struggled this year because he didn't have a big-time guy playing alongside him to take some of the pressure.

If you think a C is too harsh of a grade, consider this: Quincy Morgan caught 64 passes himself last year. Lockett (24), Brandon Clark (19) and Ricky Lloyd (20) combined for 63 this year. Inexperienced quarterbacks had something to do with it, but production was down big time.

Next year could be worse unless someone emerges. Lockett, Clark and Lloyd all played their final game at KSU Stadium against Missouri.

Tight Ends: B+

Nick Warren was better than advertised, despite the fact K-State always underuses its tight ends. Warren had a nice year, posting more catches and yards than Shad Meier did last season.

Offensive line: B+

Despite being plundered by injuries, the offensive line opened big holes for the running game the entire season. Pass protection could have been better. Andy Eby and Nick Leckey were the top performers on the line.

Kickers: F

It was really ugly watching the Wildcats kick this year. Before Joe Rheem hit three field goals against Missouri on Saturday, K-State had only four the entire year. Four! Forget field goals. Jared Britte, Kyle Altvater, Wade Waltman, Travis Brown and Rheem all missed at least one extra point. Are these guys on scholarship? Hopefully, Rheem is the answer.

Overall, a very inconsistent season for the Wildcat offense. That's what happens when there's inexperience at quarterback. They lose a lot again this off-season. Coaches will be counting on either Roberson or Dunn to be the leader next year.

All in the family

The Hammonds, pictured from left, are Jacques, Janet, Eugene, Jeanette and Jessica. The group has been singing together since they all were very young, and they will perform tomorrow in the K-State Student Union Courtyard as part of the Lunchtime Lounge series.

Sibling singers to perform at Union

BY JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

When it comes to music, for the Hammonds, it's all in the family.

The Hammond family will perform from noon to 1 p.m. today in the K-State Student Union Courtyard. The group is comprised of four sisters and their brother.

Jessica Hammond, soprano, said they have been singing together since they were very young, learning the ropes of gospel music in church together. With a family that has a background in music, Hammond said the siblings all have developed musical talents.

"We have great ears, and our ability to hear different parts in a piece is excellent," she said. "Also, our voices blend very well together."

Hammond said her father, mother and grandmothers on both sides have all been gospel singers. Her paternal grandmother even recorded an album at one point. Now this generation carries on the tradition.

Practice comes easy since they are so close, alto Janet Hammond, freshman in political science, said.

Janet said she has been singing with her seven other brothers and sisters since she could talk. Music is her means of expression, she said.

"I like to share my feelings, and I think I express myself musically better than I do talking because I talk a lot, but the feeling doesn't come across like it does when I'm singing," Janet said.

The group will be accompanied by keyboardist Tim Robinson and their brother, Michael Hammond, on drums. Jessica said they will be singing some Christmas music as well as gospel music and a song written by their uncle. With every song they perform, it might be written by someone else, but the siblings make it their own, Jessica said.

The family attends the Faith

The Hammonds

The Hammond family will perform for free from noon to 1 p.m. today in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

Covenant Center in Junction City where they are involved with the church musically, Jessica said. The religious message is part of the gospel music Jessica said she hopes people pick up.

"Singing is a form of worship for us," she said. "It's our praise to God. The Bible says God inhabits the praises of his people, so when we sing to him, it's like he's coming down to spend some time with us."

Old gospel music is where Eugene Hammond, the only male singer in the group, said he finds inspiration. The older gospel music is more appealing because the message is stronger than in contemporary gospel, Eugene said.

"It's based on a relationship with God, and it talks about the comfort and the peace found in the ways of God," he said.

During the last 10 years, Jessica said, the family has been performing together outside of their church, doing invitation-based performances in nearby towns. Jessica said her family is easy to perform with.

"I don't want to brag but we all fit together very well," she said. "We all have a wide range vocally so we can switch parts around and make things fit. We probably don't rehearse as much as we should but it's just all so natural with us anyway."

Though he performs with school choirs, Eugene said he always prefers his brothers and sisters.

"There's nobody else like my family because some people are good, but they're just not my family," he said. "I know I'm biased, but everyone else is pale in comparison to singing with my family."

Theater troupe presents comic nuns in musical

BY JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

The spirit of Christmas, a country-singing nun and a cross-dressing priest are all part of the fun in "Nuncrackers."

The musical is the fourth play in the "Nonsense" series and is now showing at the Junction City Little Theatre. Director Jill Volland said the comic nuns have proved to be a big draw.

"We did another one of the 'Nonsense' plays here before, and people came back two or three times to see it," she said. "It was a huge hit in the community. It's a very family-oriented show, and it's a fun Christmas show."

In "Nuncrackers," a group of nuns and the parish priest are planning

Christmas when the presents they have bought for each other mysteriously disappear. Several sketches and musical numbers within the musical help to convey the Christmas message.

Deb Barnes, instructor at Fort Riley Middle School, plays Sister Amnesia. She said "Nuncrackers" is appropriate because of the comic material.

"We need something light-hearted this season with all that's happening," she said. "This is just something to let people smile and get ready for the season."

Charles Volland plays Father Virgil. He said it was fun working with his daughter, Jill, as director. Volland said he was the unofficial music director and he enjoyed the variety of styles of music that are used.

Holiday Nonsense

"Nuncrackers" will show at 8 p.m. Friday and Saturday at the Junction City Little Theatre. Tickets are $10 for adults and $5 for students and are available at the Little Theatre, (785) 238-6220.

Finally, getting an audience to see the play helps the actors, Volland said.

"Trying to keep the comedy element in weeks of rehearsal where no one is reacting is challenging sometimes," he said. "The audience motivates you in performances."

Jill said the play was brought to her by Barnes, and she knew she wanted to do the script because it allowed for more than just adult performers.

"In the summer, we do a theater workshop with kids in the community, but there aren't many shows that give them a chance to perform," she said. "There's a lot of talented kids in the arts, and we want to carry that on by giving them something positive to do."

Elizabeth Sites plays Sister Robert Ann. She said attending a Catholic school when she was younger gives her special insight into some of the jokes in the play.

The play is something different for her since she doesn't often do musicals, so Sites said she enjoys the change of pace.

For Barnes, acting gives her the chance to experience what it's like becoming someone else.

"Any time you're on stage you get to step outside yourself," she said. "Up there you can be whoever you want and do whatever you want."

Ashcroft: terrorist suspects being detained might link to bin Laden

BY KAREN GULLO
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Attorney General John Ashcroft announced Tuesday his department continues to detain more than 550 people on immigration violations or other federal charges in the terrorism investigation, and some are believed to be members of Osama bin Laden's network.

Ashcroft said those detained were rounded up in a "deliberate campaign of arrests" designed to disrupt terrorist activities and protect Americans.

"With arrests and detentions, we have avoided further terrorist attacks. ... America's defenses have grown stronger," he said.

Ashcroft said that a number of individuals being detained are suspected terrorists, adding, "I don't want to be more specific."

The attorney general's announcement was the first accounting of people in federal custody in several weeks. Previously, the government had said only that it detained or arrested more than 1,100 people without identifying them or saying which remained in custody.

Ashcroft said the terrorism investigation had charged 104 people with federal crimes, and that 55 of those remained in custody. In addition, he said, 548 people remain in custody on immigration charges, some of whom are also charged with federal crimes.

The announcement comes amid concerns in Congress and among civil rights groups about the secrecy surrounding those who have been detained, most of whom are believed to be of Middle Eastern descent.

Ashcroft defended the secrecy, including the fact that most of the names of the detainees have not been public, saying he wanted to protect the privacy of people who might be innocent and prevent bin Laden from gaining valuable information.

"I am not interested in providing, when we are at war, a list to Osama bin Laden and the al-Qaeda network of the people we have detained that would make any easier their effort to kill Americans," Ashcroft said.

On Monday, Ashcroft said he also was protecting the privacy of detainees.

"I'm not going to develop some sort of blacklist," he said.

His remarks Monday prompted complaints from civil rights groups who have urged the Justice Department to disclose more information about those detained or arrested in the terrorism investigation.

"It is ironic that the government is now concerned about rights when it has arrested and jailed hundreds of people without giving the American public any proof that the detainees are being treated fairly and consistent with the protections of the Constitution and Bill of Rights," said Lucas Guttentag, head of the American Civil Liberties Union's immigration rights project.

Ashcroft's refusal came as the terrorism investigation advanced overseas and a federal agent in Virginia described a possible motive for one of the 19 hijackers on Sept. 11. FBI Special Agent Jesus Gomez said suspected terrorist ringleader Mohammed Atta blamed the United States for most of the world's wars.

"Atta felt that the U.S. was responsible for most of the wars being fought in the world," Gomez said during an abbreviated preliminary hearing in Alexandria, Va., federal court for Agus Budiman, an Indonesian man who prosecutors believe was a close associate of Atta.

Budiman, 31, had contacts with Atta and another hijacker, Marwan al-Shehhi, Gomez told a judge at Budiman's detention hearing. The agent did not specify how he learned of Atta's beliefs about America.

Budiman also was associated with Ramsi Binalshibh, who the FBI says was meant to be the 20th hijacker. Binalshibh twice tried unsuccessfully to use his association with Budiman as a means to enter the United States, Gomez said.

Binalshibh, a Yemeni citizen who had been living in Hamburg, is the subject of an international manhunt.

Budiman is facing document fraud charges unrelated to Sept. 11, but prosecutors suspect that the man Budiman allegedly helped to obtain a fake Virginia ID card, Mohammad Bin Nasser Belfas, is a contact for bin Laden, suspected of directing the terror attacks.

Budiman's court-appointed attorney disqualified himself after Gomez testified about the man's links to the terrorists. The lawyer, a retired Army officer, said he had friends who died Sept. 11 when hijackers crashed an American Airlines jet into the Pentagon.

Ivan Yacub, Budiman's immigration lawyer, said his client only knew Atta casually and had not seen Atta since he came to the United States in October 2000.

Most of the more than 1,100 people arrested or detained by federal or state authorities are being held on immigration violations. Others are charged with unrelated criminal offenses or are being held as material witnesses.

Civil liberties groups and members of Congress have asked the Justice Department to disclose information about the detainees, where they are being held and whether they have been released. The department has demurred, citing grand jury rules, judges' orders and privacy concerns.

Cloned eggs act as medicine

BY RANDOLPH E. SCHMID
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A scientist whose company announced the first cloning of a human embryo says that if he had 200 to 300 human eggs to work with, he would have a 90-percent chance of creating a colony of stem cells that might fight human disease.

"Human eggs are very precious and hard to come by," said Dr. Jose Cibelli, vice president of research at Advanced Cell Technology.

The Worcester, Mass., company announced Sunday that it had succeeded in cloning a human embryo for the first time, growing it to six cells before it quit developing.

The company's ultimate goal is to cull stem cells from a cloned embryo, master cells that could then be grown into custom medical treatments for patients — but this first embryo was too small to generate stem cells.

"These are baby steps, but they are steps in the right direction," Cibelli said Tuesday.

However, the disclosure prompted denunciations from right-to-life groups and a call by President Bush for a ban on cloning.

Cibelli said he didn't expect the strong response and speculated that the president was caught unaware.

"I hope eventually he'll be able to understand," Cibelli said in an interview.

He said the process of developing a human clone was much harder than with animals because of the scarcity of human eggs.

"It took us a year to get 17," he said. "With cows, we get 400 a day."

In developing the human clone, the researchers started with a donated female egg cell. They removed its nucleus and replaced it with a cumulus cell, complete with its genetic DNA. Cumulus cells normally help nurture eggs as they develop.

Such a technique could only yield replacement cells for women of childbearing age. But the researchers have also experimented with injecting cells with DNA from skin cells.

"What is happening in these eggs is magical," Cibelli said.

If his researchers could get 200 to 300 human eggs to experiment with, there would be a 90-percent chance of developing a stem cell line, Cibelli said.

Creating stem cells is a prime goal of cloning researchers because they form early in the development of an embryo and can then become virtually any part of the body.

Properly developed, cloned stem cells could offer hope to many people suffering diseases that require transplants of various tissues.

But opponents of cloning fear the process also will be used to create copies of human beings, a procedure with serious religious and ethical considerations.

"I am confused as to why we seem to have such a hard time making the distinction between reproductive and therapeutic uses," Cibelli said.

He said his personal opinion is that reproductive cloning is bad because it's too dangerous for both the mother and the child, but millions of people can benefit from therapeutic cloning.

Asked how he responds to people who liken therapeutic cloning — where the embryo must be destroyed to harvest the stem cells — to abortion, Cibelli said, that's an extremely personal view.

In therapeutic cloning, the researcher borrows the machinery of the egg for five to seven days and can save lives, he said, adding, "I don't think that's the creation of a human being. It's a new way of making medicine."

Cibelli said ethical questions were a main consideration during his company's research on a human clone, and the company's ethics committee set strict requirements for the safety and informed consent of the people donating cells.

Human cloning could be banned in the United States if the Senate agrees to a bill already passed by the House. It's banned now in some states.

Asked if his company would move its research overseas in the event of a ban, Cibelli responded that "we need to make a strong enough case to do the work in the United States."

He said scientists would be willing to consult with Congress and the White House on the issue.

Congress monitoring missile proposals between U.S., Egypt

BY BARRY SCHWEID
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Congress is looking into reports that North Korea is providing Egypt with long-range missiles even as the Bush administration plans to sell the Arab country more than 50 surface-to-surface missiles in a $400 million arms deal, a congressional source said Tuesday.

Administration officials have been asked to testify behind closed doors Friday on the reports of a North Korean missile deal. The United States plans to arm Egypt with 53

Harpoon Block II satellite-guided anti-ship missiles were reported by The Washington Post and confirmed on Capitol Hill.

Two senior members of Congress — Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and Rep. Tom Lantos, D-Calif., senior Democrat on the House International Relations Committee — have questioned the U.S. deal as a potential threat to Israeli ships. Presumably, the missiles could reach land targets as well.

The deal was outlined in a classified memorandum to Congress in early November, said the congress-sional aide, speaking on condition of anonymity.

It surfaced as Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Maher was arriving in Washington for talks with Secretary of State Colin Powell and members of Congress on Thursday.

Meanwhile, a senior State Department official plans to go to Saudi Arabia this week to confer with officials of the Arab kingdom about efforts to counter terrorism.

William Burns, the assistant secretary of state, also will report on new U.S. efforts to establish a cease-fire and start Israel and the Palestinians on a path of peacemaking.

Burns is in the region with Anthony Zinni, a retired Marine Corps. general, to try to mediate a cease-fire and rekindle peace talks.

Zinni is staying on, but Burns will make stops in a handful of Arab countries and return to Washington.

The New York Times, in a report from Riyadh, said Saudi Arabia was balking at American requests to freeze the bank accounts of those the United States says are linked to terrorism.

The report said a U.S. delegation would be sent to Saudi Arabia to persuade its officials to cooperate.

But Richard Boucher, the State

Department spokesman, credited the Saudis with excellent cooperation in cutting off financial assets for terrorists. The Riyadh government has instructed banks to look for and freeze accounts linked to terrorists, Boucher said Tuesday.

An official at the Saudi embassy called the story in the Times absolute nonsense.

Earlier, two administration officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, told The Associated Press that the Saudis are cooperating. They said Burns would head the delegation and that terrorism is one of several items on his agenda.

One of the officials said Powell's assertion earlier in the month that the Saudis were cooperating in the U.S. campaign against terrorism was still on the mark.

White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said later, "The Saudi Arabian government has done everything the United States has asked it to do in the war on terrorism."

Bush spoke by phone Tuesday with Jordan's King Abdullah, Fleischer said. He said they discussed the war in Afghanistan and the Mideast peace process, but he had no further details.

TIMELESS TRADITIONS

Inexpensive, simple trends contribute to holiday decorations

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

American flags are on Christmas trees, ribbons are the season's instant decoration and icicle lights are still in.

This year's holiday décor has many timeless traditions, but also brings simple trends that are not only easy, but cheap for students.

"The beauty of Christmas is that it's not terribly trendy," said Lynn Urlick, interior designer and owner of Lynn Urlick Interior Design. "Things don't change that much from year to year."

Still, Urlick said she has noticed more patriotic ornaments and decorations this year that have not been as available in the past. When trends arise, she said, it is easy to let it clutter your living space.

It is best, she said, to keep it simple.

"It's better to stick with a few significant things than a lot of clutter this and that," she said. "It has a better design impact."

A challenge for students is dealing with a smaller living space to achieve that design impact, she said.

They can combat this by not adding many more large items to their rooms, and instead strategically placing ribbons and bows on furniture and items already in the rooms, she said.

One way for anyone to work more effectively with a small space is to not have a full-sized holiday tree, she said.

Since her family usually is not at home on Christmas Day, she has not had a full evergreen in her house in 10 years.

"You should consider using a cutting or a live small cedar instead of a full tree," she said. "You could ask a farmer if you could cut down a nice cedar from their pasture, which are sometimes considered a nuisance.

They are fragrant and wonderful."

She said a small tree would not only fit the simple trends of today, but also would be a cheap alternative since less ornaments and only one string of lights are needed.

Linda Williams, owner of Country Gift Shop, said customers actually are buying more ornaments this year because they are purchasing more trees.

"Many people are having more than one tree," Williams said. "They're putting them in their living rooms, their kitchens and in other parts of their homes. It's an opportunity to have a variety of different looks."

If students don't have the money or don't want to spend the time in decorating multiple trees, she said ornaments are good pieces to highlight homes.

"You can just do so much with ornaments," she said. "You can put them in a bowl or hang them from a wreath instead of a tree."

She also said she's been buying more Americana items for her customers who are incorporating the patriotic look into their holiday decorating.

Metallic and blues have been more popular this year, Sharon Johnson, Kmart operations manager, said.

"Two years ago, everyone just had to have mauves and pinks," she said. "If we put those out on the floor now, everyone would cringe."

Customers seem to want items that look handmade this year as well, she said. They are buying a lot of snowmen, wreaths and painted sleighs.

"Everyone is going for that crafty-type-Martha Stewart stuff," she said.

"It just seems to be a trend. Everyone's going to all the craft shows, and they want to incorporate it into their Christmas decorating."

'TRL Christmas' has something for everyone, focuses on younger generation of listeners

BY JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

Driven by some of the biggest names in pop music, "TRL Christmas" either will make your head bob with the candy-cane tracks or it will make your ears bleed before you hit the stop button.

The disc has something for nearly everyone in its 15 upbeat Christmas tracks, but if you don't like top 40 music, you'll be skipping through all but a couple of songs. True to the title, the lineup on this album looks like Carson Daly himself picked it.

The three lead tracks are done by Willa Ford, "Nsync and Christina Aguilera with Aguilera impressively standing out as she belts out "Angels We Have Heard On High."

Blink-182's crass anti-Christmas "I Won't Be Home For Christmas" counteracts some of the sappy tunes with the words "It's Christmas time again / It's time to be nice to the people you can't stand / All year / I'm growing tired of all this Christmas cheer."

To please those above the age of 14, the album has a couple of tracks that might appeal to a broader spectrum of listeners.

Weezer's "The Christmas Song" and Jimmy Fallon's "Snowball" stand out on the otherwise predictable album. Fallon brings his Saturday Night Live humor to the disc as he sings "Snow day, school's closed and I can't wait / To go outside and I just might / Get into a snowball fight."

Little T and One Track Mike's "Snow Angel" surprisingly is one of the most interesting tracks on the album.

Poetic hip-hop rhymes backed up by a sentimental beat and melody provided by One Track Mike make the song something more than the humorous rap songs the duo are accustomed to.

The Trans-Siberian Orchestra's "Christmas Canon" reworks

CD REVIEW BY JJ DUNCAN

Pachabell's age-old classic to end off the album. It's an unlikely tasteful selection that rounds off the disc quite nicely.

All in all, most of this album is fluff that your 13-year-old sister or cousin probably will love. With names like Sugar Ray and LFO, you can't expect much more. A few of the tracks still are worth checking out, even if TRL music isn't your cup of tea.

It's a well-balanced Christmas album for mostly a younger generation that packs a few surprises inside.

SHOPPING CHARADE

Local businesses prepare for rush of season's patrons

BY EDIE HALL
Kansas State Collegian

Less than a month of shopping days are left before Christmas. Local merchants have been preparing their inventory and staff for the influx in business the month of December usually brings.

The months of November and December accounted for 27.1 percent of items sold at malls in 2000, according to the International Council of Shopping Centers.

Business for most retail stores increases considerably in the months before the Christmas holiday.

According to ICSC, 98 percent of malls will extend their holiday shopping hours to accommodate this extra business.

Manhattan Town Center is lengthening its business hours beginning Dec. 8 and running through Christmas. Instead of being open from 10 a.m. until 9 p.m. on weekdays, the mall will be open from 9:30 a.m. until 9:30 p.m.

Stores within the mall also might hire extra help and have extra training for staff to deal with the increase.

"I would say business probably increases about 50 percent," Waldenbooks store manager Melissa Theel said. "When the holidays are coming up, we advise our staff that business will be picking up and that they need to be on their toes."

Theel also said Waldenbooks

hires temporary holiday help.

"I start looking at applications the beginning of September and have the extra help hired by the first of October," Theel said. "We really consider people who will be staying in town over the holidays. We need them the day after Thanksgiving and the day after Christmas."

According to the survey ICSC sent out, most respondents thought video game hardware and software and entertainment products such as CD's, videos and DVD's would report the highest sales growth during the 2001 holiday season.

Musicland in Manhattan Town Center is getting ready for those expectations, Whitney Gebhart, employee, said.

"We do a lot more hiring during the holidays," Gebhart said. "Usually, we add upwards to six people for holiday temps. They go through training, and we also implement new programs, such as gift cards, during this time."

Although it is new to the mall, Aeropostale is anxious and excited for the holiday season, store manager Teresa Sharritt said.

"We are a first-year store here, and there are only two Aeropostales in Kansas—here and in Topeka. So, since we are new to the area, we are expecting a little more than the normal holiday business increase."

Sharritt said she is expecting four or five times as many customers as the store has on a regular day in the days before Christmas.

Outside of the mall, businesses might not expect quite the same type of increase.

"We can feel a definite increase before the holidays, but we aren't as dependent on it as other merchants may be," said

Clark Peters, assistant sales manager for The Pathfinder. "We don't really have to do anything all that different. We just make certain we have gift-type items in stock."

Because the increase isn't as Merchants stock up on K-State apparel, gifts

BY TINA DEINES
Kansas State Collegian

Christmas is getting closer, and the season of shopping is right around the corner. While most people are wondering what they should buy for friends and family members, local merchants are stocking up on their K-State gifts and apparel.

According to area businesses, purple is big during the Christmas season.

"K-State sweatshirt blankets are big sellers, etched glasses and anything purple — jackets, coats and leather coats," Varney's cashier Linda Lillibridge said.

Carolyn Rose, K-State Union Bookstore clothing and gift buyer, said she agreed that K-State items sell well during the holiday season.

"For Christmas gifts, we sell a lot of keepsake items such as pen and pencil sets and ornaments. This year, we also have Henry and Alice the snowmen, which is also popular."

Andrea Higgins, assistant manager of The Palace, said K-State merchandise also sells well at The Palace.

She said one of the biggest sellers

in previous years has been the K-State Santas.

"I don't think we've sold as many this year, but there's still quite a few shopping days left. They've been quite a good seller in the past," she said.

Some of the other K-State Christmas items available include dancing Santas, a variety of ornaments and apparel.

With the fall semester ending in December, Higgins said this influences the sell of K-State items.

"We sell K-State merchandise very well because of winter graduation," she said.

Rose said she agreed and said the new K-State alumni ring is a popular choice among customers who are buying for recent graduates.

"The Union Bookstore is the K-State official sales point for the new alumni ring, so people are ordering those as gifts," Rose said.

Dan Burr, cashier for Ballard's Sporting Goods, said that while the store carries specialty Christmas items, regular K-State merchandise such as license plates and clothing sell well.

"Basically, we sell more apparel than knick-knack things," Burr said.

"When the holidays are coming up, we advise our staff that business will be picking up and that they need to be on their toes."

Spirit of season reason for holiday job

There is nothing that compares to the joys and frustrations of working retail during the holidays. Since my first job, I've always worked retail during the holidays.

Many people think working retail during the holidays must be a living hell. You probably think I'm insane for continuing to work retail after almost five holiday seasons.

There are two things that keep me in there — the people and the spirit of the season.

Last Christmas I worked at a store that was always incredibly busy. Even with all of our cash registers running, we still had lines of customers stretching out the door.

There's nothing more frustrating than waiting in line for half an hour to pay for one tiny Christmas gift when you have 8 million other things you could be doing.

This is the perfect climate for someone to lose his or her temper. Tensions start to mount. People begin to sweat and emit foul odors underneath their layers of winter insulation. Little kids start to cry.

At this point, the customer must make a decision. Some put down their intended purchases and walk out of the store, mumbling under their breath about how insane the holiday rush is. Others sigh and shift their weight to the other foot and continue to wait patiently. Then, you have the complainers.

They feel as if it is their duty to let every employee they see know how horrible the service is. They say the situation is unacceptable and something must be done to meet their needs. Now.

These are the people who make working retail a living hell. They blame you for computer malfunctions. They think it's your fault an item was more popular than expected and the warehouse didn't send you enough supply to meet their demand. They want to make your life miserable just because they couldn't buy a $9 bottle of body lotion in their favorite scent that was discontinued five years ago.

If I had to deal with people like this all day, I would be pulling my hair out before the end of my shift was over. Thankfully, most people aren't that way.

Working in a retail store over the holidays has always been interesting. I usually can spot the brothers/sons/boyfriends/husbands who have no idea what the person they're buying for wants. These are the people who make working retail fun.

It's pretty much the same every time. A male walks into the store with the look of a deer caught in headlights on his face. He hesitates and moves to the side to avoid the women and children milling about and picking up bottles of scented lotions and shower gels. Their posture and expression belie how intimidated the men are.

Usually, they don't know what they're looking for. They just want something that their sister/mom/girlfriend/wife would be happy with. Although it sometimes takes a while to find the perfect gift, their actions at the end of the transaction always remind me of what the holiday season really is about.

Their faces light up with delight, relief and expectation. No longer do they have to wander around crowded malls searching for a gift they hope will please their recipient. Now all they have to do is wait for Christmas day so they can enjoy the praise for giving a gift that was exactly what someone wanted.

The holiday season is about charity and giving, even in the retail sector. I love being able to help people find the perfect gift that will make someone else happy. It makes me feel like I'm doing my part to spread the joy and warmth of the holiday season.

The icing on the cake is when your customers say two simple words: "Thank you." It makes enduring all of the rude, smelly customers, crying children and Christmas muzak bearable.

Finding the true meaning

Satisfaction of gift-giving should not be lost

It feels great when you find the perfect gift.

You can imagine in your mind's eye the look on the recipients' faces as they shed the wrapping paper and the one thing that they wanted this holiday season appears in their hands.

That's happened all of twice in my life. Usually I find something within my budget, and maybe they'll have a use for it. Time, money and effort limit the ability for one human being to shop successfully for 40 friends and family.

As frustrating as the holiday gift-giving season is, the warmth you feel when you brighten someone's day is in itself the best gift in the world.

The aged wisdom that "It's the thought that counts" is true, as is "It's better to give than to receive." But it's easy to lose perspective.

Ben Dolezal/Collegian

When you've spent 12 hours rumbling, stumbling, and tumbling through the sea of fellow shoppers, it's easy to become disenfranchised.

The holidays have become so commercialized that the true meaning of giving is lost in the holiday shuffle.

The thought no longer counts. Now it's the price tag. It's having the trendiest toys and the coolest clothes. People were wrestling over Tickle Me Elmo dolls when they were the fad. That's ridiculous. I bet half the Elmo dolls don't even work now. Game systems like the Nintendo or Sega Genesis are outdated by the time any decent games come out. Clothes are out of style by the time you buy them.

If it were the thought that counted, no one would ever buy a Furbee. We would buy gifts based on what a person could really use or really wants. That's not easy, though.

It can be hard to find the right gift for that special someone. It can be downright impossible to shop for that uncle you only see on the holidays, yet there is that moral obligation to get him something. There are a few ways to increase your odds of figuring out the ideal gift for your girlfriend, boss or grandmother.

First, listen to what they talk about. Not only will you get more out of the relationship, but they also might drop subtle or subconscious hints about a sweater they found at the mall that they are crazy about.

They might also complain about something they have that's broken. Maybe your mom has been using the same baking pan since the Eisenhower administration and is a little worse for wear. The fact that you figured out something they could really use would mean the world to them.

Another way to get gift ideas is to look at their hobbies. What sorts of things do they enjoy doing? If you can piggyback your gift onto something they already enjoy, like mountain biking and a new water bottle or arm band Walkman, the lucky recipient will love it.

Talk to their friends. They might have been shopping with them and noticed the look on their face when they saw the perfect leather coat.

Worst-case scenario, you can just ask them. You can expect the response, "Oh, I don't know." But on the random chance that they happen to think of something, it might be worth your while.

The secret to gift-giving is to care about the person you are shopping for. Apathy usually leads to shoddy presents. Caring about the people and wanting to get them something they'll enjoy will show through in the end.

If someone happens to get you the perfect gift, don't feel bad, because you didn't get him or her a gift of equal caliber. Gifts shouldn't be a form of showing up someone else, but rather of making others happy.

It truly is better to give than to receive, but that's easier said than done. We all love getting presents, especially college students.

The feeling of getting free stuff is great, but it pales in comparison to that aforementioned look on a person's face when he or she gets a gift from you.

It feels so good to get a gift because you know the people were thinking about you when they saw it and bought it or made it just for you. Thus, giving the gift is a great way to let the people know that you were thinking about them.

Keep in mind the reason for the holiday season. It's not to spend as much money as you can on your friends and family. It is about showing the ones you care about how much you care.

Even if it's just a hand-written card mailed to an old friend in California or Florida, the effort makes all the difference in the world.

drastic, Peters said the store doesn't usually hire new help, but instead gives the normal staff extra hours.

"Most of our staff is college students, and I'm sure they enjoy the extra money," Peters said.

According to the survey conducted by ICSC, many respondents said extra money available for spending as a result of lower interest rates, tax relief and mortgage refinancing would be factors supporting consumer spending this year.

While some respondents were skeptical about this year's holiday season because of declining consumer confidence and uncertainty surrounding the possibility of war, others anticipated that patriotism might fuel additional spending this holiday season.

Malls take Halloween precautions

BY FRANK FLATON
Kansas State Collegian

A presumed terrorist attack at malls on Halloween has been proven to be a hoax, but national threats resulting from the events Sept. 11 have risen eyebrows about the possibilities.

Federal and state authorities have disproven a heavily circulated e-mail that claims a woman's boyfriend warned her to not take any flights on Sept. 11 and avoid malls Halloween.

The FBI linked the letter back to a direct source, but the writer admitted the letter's information was from a friend of a friend.

"It's totally bogus," said Kyle Smith, Kansas Bureau of Investigation spokesman, citing the FBI's investigation of the e-mail. "Our team, of course, checked it out and found it to be a complete fabrication."

The Riley County Police Department and the Manhattan Town Center also said there was no evidence to suggest such an attack in Manhattan.

However, because of airplane attacks and anthrax scares, the federal government has urged the American public to be on alert.

Mall administrators followed the lead. Allen Raynor, general manager of the Manhattan Town Center, said the mall added security guards and intensified measures Wednesday during its annual trick-or-treating event.

"There's nothing that suggests an attack in Manhattan and specifically the mall," he said. "However, given all that has happened we are vigilant. The president urged us all to go on with our life. The catch phrase is don't be afraid, but alert. That's exactly what we're doing."

Raynor wouldn't specify the amount of guards, because he didn't want to inform anyone who might be considering an attack. He did say that mall officials performed several security screens that included looking for unusual packages and checking service areas.

Malls in Tucson, Ariz., Pittsburgh, Penn., and Atlanta chose to postpone Halloween events.

"We're going full speed," he said. "In fact, we're doing more than we have ever done."

Raynor said the hype from the e-mail and government warnings didn't disrupt business. He said the mall was full before trick-or-treating and packed with children during.

The perceived threat was still enough to keep the Bowman and Haney families from attending the mall's celebration.

Pentagon calling up 50,000 more reserves

BY ROBERT BURNS
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C.—The Pentagon expects to call up more reservists than the 50,000 originally believed needed for the war on terrorism, officials said Wednesday. Most will be reporting for home-front duty.

The increase reflects heightened concern about potential terrorist attacks on nuclear plants and federal installations as well as an expanding war effort in Afghanistan, where U.S. planes bombed military targets for a 25th day.

Reviewing progress in the bombing campaign in Afghanistan, Rear Adm. John Stufflebeem, deputy director of operations for the Joint Chiefs of Staff, confirmed the use of B-52 bombers all over the country, including Taliban forces in the north.

He said the B-52s have the capacity to carry large loads of weapons to carpet-bomb Afghanistan's front-line forces.

During a Pentagon news conference, Stufflebeem also said recent attacks have so severely damaged the Taliban's

Projected revenue to be released

The nation's slumping economy likely will lead to bad news for K-State and the rest of Kansas.

On Friday, legislative staff and university economists will give predictions about how much revenue the state can expect to collect during its 2003 fiscal year, which begins July 1.

With last spring's downturn in the economy and the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, expectations are low.

Sue Peterson, K-State's director of governmental relations, said she anticipates K-State will not get the 4-percent increase in state appropriations it is asking for.

"When there's a recession and/or a projected reduction, either way, colleges get hit," Peterson said.

Especially, she said, since education makes up 68 percent of the state's budget.

"There's not a lot of other places to cut," she said.

The 4-percent increase wish from last year's $167.5 million in state appropriations could be reduced to 2 or 0 percent, Peterson said.

"They could say they're taking 1 percent off everybody's 2002 base," she said.

Asbestos discovered near Seaton

BY MICHAEL WATSON
Kansas State Collegian

Asbestos was found on campus Tuesday while workers were preparing for a new memorial at K-State.

They found the asbestos material while digging in an area in front of Seaton Hall. They were digging holes in the K-State Student Union Plaza to plant thornless hackberry trees — a memorial to the victims of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

"We removed as much of the visible material as we could," said Steven Galitzer, associate director of public safety. "We bagged it like we do other asbestos waste."

"We pulled out the friable asbestos, and what we are going to do is rebury the non-friable asbestos," he said.

Friable asbestos is more hazardous than non-friable asbestos. Friable asbestos is fragile and can be crushed into a fine powder. Non-friable asbestos is not easily crushed.

A week of fire prevention messages led 3-year-old Devin Moore to make a very important decision — what he was going to be for Halloween.

His decision? A firefighter.

"They did a whole fire prevention week at school, so he decided that's what he wanted to be," his mother, Erin Stober, said.

With a red gleaming hat atop his head and a coat with yellow reflective stripes to match, he dressed the part very well.

Moore was one of hundreds of children who flocked to Aggieville for its 12th annual trick-or-treating Halloween festivities Wednesday.

"We started doing it to provide a safe place for the kids to trick-or-treat," said Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association. "The merchants here really get into it and like to see the kids dressed up. It's just grown every year."

Each year, the main strip of Aggieville on Moro Street is blocked off, and merchants dress up and hand out candy. This year, prizes, balloons and pumpkins also were given out. Additionally, the association collected cans of food for the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Sieben said about 95 percent of the 115 Aggieville merchants participated.

Cynthia Herrington, senior in interior architecture and Varney's Book Store employee, said she is glad Aggieville puts on the event.

"It's hard with the neighborhoods being mostly college students for kids to go trick-or-treating," she said.

Plus, it's her favorite holiday. "It's the only time you get to act like an idiot and it's OK," she said. "I love it."

With sounds of witches screaming and cackling emanating through the streets, children took the holiday seriously, too. Princesses, ice skaters, clowns, wizards and cartoon characters all roamed the streets of Aggieville on one mission — to get candy.

For Katie, 9, and 7-year-old twins Karin and Kelley Sol, their goal was to fill their plastic pumpkins to the brim with candy. The candy, they said, was the best part of the event.

"We have come every year for years," their mother, Jill Sol, said. "They've got the best candy."

Kathy Wilson said she brought her two kids because they had enjoyed it in previous years.

"We're just out here to have fun," she said.

She said she likes the event because it's in the daylight, so it's safe, and because her children get excited for it. She said she did not hesitate to bring them this year, despite e-mails warning of possible attacks on Halloween.

Sieben said some of the merchants had mentioned such e-mails, but no one was nervous.

"We've just tried to go on like normal," she said.

Sieben said getting the community together for a fun event is her favorite part of the holiday.

"I love it," she said. "I just love it."

Alleged Lawrence robbery suspect files guilty plea

TOPEKA — A Lawrence man pleaded guilty Tuesday to attempted bank robbery.

Paul David Lee, 58, acknowledged that he walked into a Firststar bank branch in Lawrence with a pellet gun and took an employee hostage. Lee surrendered to police after an hourlong standoff.

Lee's attorney, Ronald Wurtz, said Lee was under physical, mental and financial stress and acted out of desperation in the Nov. 30, 2000, robbery.

As part of the plea agreement in U.S. District Court, prosecutors agreed to ask for a reduced sentence at Lee's sentencing Jan. 31. Lee could have faced 20 years in prison.

Graves not interfering in governor primary politics

TOPEKA — Some fellow Republicans are waiting for the GOP field in the governor's race to narrow, but Gov. Bill Graves said Tuesday he's not trying to make it happen.

Graves told reporters he isn't brokering any deals with potential candidates who consider themselves moderates, like him. He said he is leaving it to Lt. Gov. Gary Sherrer, Attorney General Carla Stovall and House Speaker Kent Glasscock to decide who runs in the GOP primary next year.

Glasscock announced his candidacy in July, but has hinted he might reconsider. Sherrer has said he has a strong interest in running, but now appears to be backing away. Stovall already has formed a fund-raising committee, but hasn't publicly committed to the race.

State Treasurer Tim Shallenburger campaigned in Garden City, Colby, Hays and Salina, finishing the two-day tour that kicked off his campaign.

Pre-teen boy accidentally kills best friend using gun

GARDEN CITY — The 12-year-old son of two sheriff's deputies accidentally shot and killed his best friend, authorities in southwest Kansas said Wednesday.

Casey Gillespie, also 12, was shot in the head Tuesday afternoon when a 22-caliber rifle discharged in the home of the deputies, about 15 miles northeast of Garden City, county attorney John Wheeler said.

The deputies were gone to parent-teacher conferences. The two 12-year-old boys and a 13-year-old boy had been plinking, or target shooting, in the yard before going back inside.

One boy sat on a bed to use a computer, reached over to move a rifle, and it went off, Wheeler said.

"The preliminary investigation indicates a tragic, accidental shooting," Wheeler said.

The Kansas Bureau of Investigation is looking into the incident.

NATION IN BRIEF

By The Associated Press

Drop in GDP signals end to long expansion period

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The economy, battered by a yearlong slowdown and the jolt of the terrorist attacks, shrank at a 0.4 percent rate from July through September, a decline that could signal the end to the longest economic expansion in U.S. history.

The drop in the gross domestic product — the total output of goods and services produced in the country — was the biggest since the first quarter of 1991 when the country was in the depths of the last recession, the Commerce Department reported Wednesday.

The weak performance reflected a sharp pullback in spending by consumers, which slowed to the weakest pace in more than eight years, and a continued plunge in investment by businesses in new plants.

Bush to impose another tariff on Canadian lumber

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Bush administration said Wednesday it would impose another tariff on Canadian lumber after finding Canada is dumping its wood on the United States at artificially low prices.

The 12.6 percent duty will be added to the 19.3 percent tariff put on Canadian softwood lumber in August because the administration found the Canadian government unfairly subsidizes its industry.

Softwood lumber, commonly used for home construction, comes from fir, pine and other cone-bearing trees.

The U.S. lumber industry has been pressing for tariffs, saying they're needed to save jobs; opponents say it will drive up prices of wood products for U.S. consumers. An economist for a homebuilders group says the two tariffs add about $1,500 to the price of an average home.

Small California town site of earthquake; no injuries

ANZA, Calif. — A 5.1-magnitude earthquake shook the Southern California desert near an active fault line, but no injuries or damage were reported.

The quake occurred around 11:56 p.m. Tuesday and was felt more than 100 miles away in Los Angeles and San Diego.

The tremor was centered nine miles east of Anza, near the San Jacinto fault, said Lucy Jones, scientist in charge at the U.S. Geological Survey office in Pasadena.

It was followed by dozens of aftershocks, but none exceeded magnitude 2.9. Those closest to the epicenter said they felt a sharp jolt followed by a rolling sensation.

"I was surprised at a lack of public transportation in Manhattan."

Student adjusts to Kansas climate, life without car

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

When choosing where to spend a year abroad, K-State was not his first pick.

Frits Christiansen, an exchange student from Aarhus, Denmark, the second largest city in the country, initially wanted to study geology at the University of Kansas.

"I only picked KU first because, based on the information off of the Internet, it seemed to match well with what courses I wanted to take," Christiansen said. "K-State ended up fine. I didn't realize it had the same courses, and I am doing well here."

He already has a bachelor of science in geology from the University of Aarhus, a two and a half hour train ride from Copenhagen. At K-State, he is a non-degree student and will pursue a master's degree in geology this summer in Denmark.

He said he remembered the stereotypes he had before arriving in Kansas.

"I knew coming to Kansas it was going to be really flat and way too hot, which is true," he said. "But it's just like Denmark. There, I can get on a train, and within a few hours, I will be in a different climate."

"Here, I can drive to the Rockies, where it's colder. It just takes a little longer."

He never realized, he said, how essential having a car is in Manhattan.

"At Aarhus, I didn't know anyone, except for professors, that had a car," he said. "Everyone walked because they didn't have enough money for a car, and they didn't need one since everything was so close."

"If you don't have a car here, you can't do anything here. I was surprised at a lack of public transportation in Manhattan."

This semester, he said he bought a bike and hopes to purchase a cheap car next semester.

"I am going to take more weekend trips and see more of the country," he said.

Attorney enjoys challenges of job

BY SARAH RICE
Kansas State Collegian

When attorney Rod Olsen goes to work every morning, he is not working for his personal advancement, but instead spends his time advocating for the rights of the injured and accused.

Olsen began his path to law at K-State where he earned a bachelor's degree in political science in 1970. He obtained his law degree at Hastings College of Law at the University of California in San Francisco.

He said he has wanted to be an attorney since he was in high school debate.

"I had some aptitude for that, and I liked arguing both sides of a question," he said. "It was enjoyable to me to persuade people to a particular position."

After passing the California Bar Exam, Olsen was a judge advocate in the United States Air Force for four years. In 1978, he passed the Kansas Bar Exam and opened his first office in Manhattan. After a year on his own, he joined Jim Morrison and Bill Frost, two of his partners.

Olsen said the population of Manhattan determines the kind of law he practices. He named K-State and Fort Riley as factors in determining the variety of cases he works on.

"It is difficult to practice one area of law because we aren't a metropolitan area," he said. "Some of the cases we do may seem to be more mundane than high-profile, but that doesn't take away the satisfaction of working on cases."

Olsen said he spends 25 to 40 percent of his practice involved in personal injury and worker's compensation cases, while the other time is spent on criminal defense and estate planning.

In Olsen's career, there are no typical days. He might be found in court, writing briefs, evaluating the claim of an injured party or preparing settlement brochures.

Olsen said that although lawyers are sometimes given a bad reputation

Mike Shepherd/Collegian

Abilene native Rod Olsen returned to Manhattan to practice law after receiving his degree in the 1970s in San Francisco. He has a downtown office on Poyntz Avenue.

or stereotype, the work they do is vital to the community.

"Lawyers have perhaps been given a bit of a bad rap by the public, but really, it's a profession where you are helping people who have no one to speak for them," he said.

Olsen has found this profession even more important when it comes to criminal defense.

"Usually, there is more to a case than meets the eye," he said. "We are not always able to avoid some of the consequences for their actions, but we can provide understanding."

He said he never has had to compromise his morals to defend someone who might be guilty.

"It is not my job to judge the person," he said. "My job is to evaluate evidence and make sure that the state can prove beyond a reasonable doubt. Most people would say that it is better that some guilty persons go free than innocent people being convicted."

Olsen said he is good at what he does because of his compassion for the underdog and respect of the judicial system.

"I appreciate the judicial system and what place it holds in our society," he said.

Manhattan attorney Derrick Roberson said Olsen's balance is what defines his excellence.

"He finds a good balance between being a strong advocate for his clients, yet still being professional and courteous to his adversaries," Roberson said.

One challenge Olsen has had to overcome is the desire to work hard in his professional life, but also leaving adequate time for his wife and three kids.

"I've had to maintain that balance," he said. "Being in private practice has allowed me to be more flexible and support my children and their activities."

Roberson said he has been impressed with Olsen's involvement with his children despite the demands of being a good attorney, including deadlines and court dates.

"I have always admired the level of support that he's provided his kids," Roberson said. "He is always there to support them, more than any other parent I have observed."

After completing his work and family responsibilities, Olsen still finds time to critique popular law-based TV shows like "Law and Order" and "The Practice."

As for the actual reality that is depicted in these shows, he said it is not as exciting for a typical attorney.

"They are fun shows, but I can't get many tips from them," he said.

Area children scare up campus holiday treats

An elevator full of witches and vampires rose to the top floor of Ford Hall on Wednesday night as they participated in the residence hall's trick-or-treat event.

The group of eager trick-or-treaters were escorted by none other than Tigger himself.

Candice Howell, freshman in kinesiology, dressed as Tigger and escorted for the many groups of tricker-or-treaters.

"It's fun working with kids, and it's organized and benefits the community. I like staying home mainly because I am past the trick-or-treating age," Howell said.

Rachel Brooks, Manhattan resident, said she has been taking her 6-year-old daughter, Autiana, to the trick-or-treat at the residence halls since she was born.

"It is safer in the dorms, and it is a great workout," Brooks said. Autiana was dressed as a leopard and filled her bucket to the brim.

"I like every kind of candy," she said to one resident.

By far, the biggest thief of Ford's candy was Bob the Builder, known by his family as 2-year-old Landon Ahning. This was Landon's first Halloween.

"Bob is by far the cutest so far tonight," said Mandy Bicknell, senior in hotel and restaurant management.

Tonya Cole, Manhattan resident and mother of two ghoulish-clad children, said she likes the residence halls' trick-or-treating because it is organized.

"The dorms are a lot more fun and safer. It is easier for the kids, and they get to see all the variety of costumes. The women are really generous as well," Cole said.

Regina Munoz, junior in elementary education and a Ford Hall resident assistant, said she thinks the Halloween event is great for the women of Ford.

"It is a good bonding experience for both the community and the floor," Munoz said.

More than 80 rooms participated in the Ford hall trick-or-treat event, said Jeni Friend, Ford Hall governing board president.

"We'll have over 100 kids come through during the night," Friend said.

New Lafene site to benefit campus in '02

Lafene Health Center is packing up its stethoscopes, tongue depressors and other medical equipment and moving to Mercy Health Center on Sunset Avenue. Officials said the move will happen by fall 2002.

We support Lafene in its move and think many positive benefits will come. Jay Reppert, medical director of Lafene, said about 300 to 350 students visit Lafene daily.

Now there are only 12 parking spots for Lafene patients to use. While many walk to the facilities or stop in for appointments between classes, when moved to the Sunset location, Lafene will be able to offer more parking for students too ill to walk.

Officials said the new space will enable Lafene to improve services. Reppert said Lafene has grown out of the space it occupies now, and the physical therapy unit is especially cramped. With the additional space, Lafene will have the chance to stretch out and even possibly instigate new services for students.

While it might be out of the way for some to jaunt over to Lafene's new building, we think this move is in the best interest for students and Lafene. We wish Lafene luck in its move, and if it needs any advice about packing — just talk to a student. We are all experts on moving by now.

Powder paranoia

Media's anthrax coverage escalates national fear

The war on America has shifted within a month.

Fear of transportation now has escalated to fear of chemical warfare. People not only are afraid to "Go Greyhound," but to open the mail, terrified by what might be lurking between envelope and paper.

Is this fear justified? Not according to the Center for Disease Control. Its Web site offers many precautionary measures regarding anthrax, but states there is no real threat of random contamination through the mail.

So why is the public raiding local pharmacies for Cipro? Preparing their homes for the likes of a nuclear fallout?

Simple. Because the media advises us to do so.

Network television is in a race with cable news channels such as CNN and FOX news to bring their viewers the latest breaking "news" on the outbreak of anthrax.

We see news anchors lamenting each segment they introduce. Many sensationalize the actual events.

With CNN and FOX devoting most of their efforts to this story, network television scrambles for stories themselves.

The effect this overexposure has on viewers is not unlike the all too frequent "updates" regarding Gary Condit and O.J. Simpson.

The public either becomes obsessed with the story, or burnt out and increasingly apathetic.

The outbreak of anthrax undoubtedly deserves more news coverage than the aforementioned men, yet this coverage is highly responsible for the inflated fears regarding anthrax.

The media's coverage of potentially fatal cases along with the public's ignorance of the disease itself is cause for alarm.

The fact that seems left off of Tom Brokaw and Dan Rather's cue cards is that anthrax infections are highly treatable.

A little less reliance on the local and national news stories and more personal research can do a world of good for the public's mindset regarding anthrax.

The Center for Disease Control has daily updates on confirmed cases of anthrax, not just hype and speculation.

It tracks, where the disease has spread, and offers tips on how to deal with and avoid exposure. The CDC Web site advises the public on how to handle suspicious packages, but is careful not to instill paranoia into the public regarding potential chemical warfare.

At www.bt.cdc.gov, the CDC explains not only what you can do to prevent the outbreak of anthrax, but also what the CDC itself is planning in the event of such a crisis.

It carefully has outlined information on an improved public health infrastructure, ranging from the training of disease detectives (the Epidemic Intelligence Service) to an increase in lab activity.

Such increases in lab activity have allowed a stock pile of pharmaceuticals, which are able to reach anywhere in the continental U.S. within 12 hours.

Tons of medical supplies were deployed to New York City within seven hours after the attack on the World Trade Center.

Although coverage of the terrorist attacks is fading, there is one lasting truth expressed through the horror of Sept. 11th: we need to continue living.

The loss of so many Americans has established a new appreciation for life, and we should spend our time on earth as they would. Not having vigil in front of the television, anticipating ominous news of chemical warfare.

At the expense of the Pentagon and the World Trade Center, a newfound patriotism arose from the ashes.

Perpetuate such feelings by entrusting your safety to not only yourself, but the government and its facilities.

The enemy might seem menacing: silent, invasive, microscopic. But if treated correctly, it is nothing more than over-hyped influenza.

Clash of the Columnists

Clash of the Columnists is a weekly rotating series. Each week, two different columnists will write columns taking a stance on an issue presented to them. Clash of the Columnists is meant to inform readers about both sides of the issue. The side argued by the columnist was the side assigned to them.

Anthrax stories realistic, provide relevant facts

This newspaper has a responsibility. The Collegian, just like any other news-oriented member of the media community, should inform the reader about events from Afghanistan to the K-State Student Union and as much as possible and the distances between. Granted, some editorial decisions about what should or should not be published must be made.

Such choices should, however, be based upon issues of taste and available space, not hiding information from the public.

Yet, some are saying the media has provided too much coverage dealing with anthrax.

On Tuesday, CNN reported 15 total anthrax infections and three deaths from inhalation infections in the nation. A Maryland mailroom that handles letters for the Justice Department has been closed.

Thirty mailrooms were being tested for the disease, and 200 other facilities were up for testing. Several layers of governmental, health and investigative agencies are involved in this nationwide threat.

If you think media coverage on facts like these have been blown out of proportion, consider the alternative. Americans, maybe even people you know, are being exposed to and dying from the anthrax bacteria.

Investigations are under way.

There is a chance, however minute, that you might be the next victim.

Would you want the press hiding that information from you?

You, as a citizen of the United States, have the distinct and pressing right to know your innocent friends and family members might become poisoned with anthrax — that the next envelope you open might contain a powdery, white substance that can kill.

How could you not want to learn and understand as much about this threat as possible?

There have been complaints the extensive coverage granted to the anthrax threat is creating unnecessary levels of fear. One main concern is how people, in their concern, are buying the antibiotic ciprofloxacin, or Cipro, when they have not been exposed.

One classmate told me her friend could not get the Cipro she needs because her local pharmacies were sold out of its supplies.

However, Cipro is not the only possible answer to the question of anthrax infection. The Center for Disease Control said from the beginning that other antibiotics will do the job just as well, according to CNN. Now, the antibiotic doxycycline is being prescribed in increasing numbers.

As citizens of this country, we have a need to know when our health and lives might be in jeopardy. If Cipro supplies are waning, an equal alternative can and will be found, and the media will inform us. One would expect the same coverage if a new hepatitis vaccination or other medical treatment was developed.

Adam Hayes/Collegian

The media have not only provided the frightening facts about exposures and fatalities, but they have done a commendable job giving people the opportunity to understand how the bacteria works and what officials are doing to prevent it.

The issue of the media and the anthrax scare comes down to one important issue: what should we want from the media?

The answer should be obvious.

This is a nation where freedom of the press was guaranteed by our founding fathers.

We should capture that freedom and hang onto it with every inch of our collective beings.

I want to know what my government is doing, especially when it affects my own safety and the health of fellow citizens.

You can make your own decision. Either choose enlightenment or crouch in the dangerous darkness of self-imposed ignorance.

Pomeroy to release 2nd album tonight at Silverado Saloon

BY BETSY STVERAK
Kansas State Collegian

After the long wait, Pomeroy has released its second album, "Cocoon Club," and will be celebrating with an album release party for Manhattan tonight at Silverado Saloon.

Bassist Dean Hopkins said the community's response to the new album still matters to them.

"Manhattan is still important because of the aspect of it being our hometown," he said. "We're hoping enough people are anxious and excited to hear it."

From "Inside the Shine," Pomeroy's first album, Hopkins said Pomeroy has advanced as a band with its latest release.

"This is our first major attempt at a real album. Our musical representation is much greater," he said.

"There are more intelligent song structures. We are more grown up and have learned a lot. 'Inside the Shine' was basically us as babies."

Along with the album, Hopkins said Pomeroy has also improved with their live performances.

"We have put more effort in promoting and advertising than the last shows," he said. "We are all a lot more aware of what we are doing musically."

"Now, with the live dancers, it's more comfortable with them on stage. I feel like it's right."

As excited as Pomeroy is about this album, Hopkins said making it did include certain challenges.

"Playing in the studio was different for me. All of my playing and learning was done in live shows, and I couldn't feel the energy of the crowd," he said.

"We are really more of a live band, and that's where we feel it the most."

One of the openers for Pomeroy is the Omaha, Neb., based band, Mandown.

Bassist Dave Backhaus said playing live shows with Pomeroy

Pomeroy performs

Pomeroy, Mandown and Yo Flaco will play a CD release party at 9 tonight at Silverado Saloon.

always is an enjoyable experience.

"Pomeroy are our best buddies as far as bands go," he said. "Even though our sounds are somewhat different, our shows seem to blend together."

Backhaus said he has seen differences in Pomeroy's performances from past shows.

"They have become a much tighter band," he said.

"They've made their songs more radio accessible."

For the show, Backhaus said he feels the Manhattan crowd will be ready for Pomeroy's return.

"People will eat up their new album," he said. "Everyone has been waiting for such a long time."

A fan of the Pomeroy's live shows, Eric Hoopingartner, junior in public relations, said he likes seeing them perform.

"The crowd really gets into it with a lot of energy," he said.

"Pomeroy is a genre of music that a lot of people like. It's similar to 311."

Hoopingartner said he has sampled Pomeroy's new CD and is looking forward to seeing the material played live.

"It's nice to hear new songs, plus they redid four old songs," he said.

The album has been in the works for three years, but it was worth the wait, Hoopingartner said.

Hopkins said he is happy with the reactions so far from the new album.

"This is a chance for us to say who we really are. We have seen a lot of people really surprised," he said.

"People are very pleased but the interesting part is the people who didn't care to get into us before, have now."

Volleyball team sweeps Jayhawks on road, extends win streak over in-state rival to 14

BY SEAN PURCELL

Kansas State Collegian

LAWRENCE — On Halloween night, people are supposed to expect the unexpected.

But the K-State volleyball team would rather things stay just the way they are. K-State (13-8, 9-5) maintained its stronghold as the state of Kansas powerhouse volleyball team, by beating the University of Kansas Jayhawks (13-12, 3-11) in three sets. K-State's win marked the 14th consecutive time the Wildcats had scored a victory over the Jayhawks.

"It's nice to beat a team on a consistent basis," head coach Suzie Fritz said.

"We just focus on playing well against everyone and trying to get wins against as many opponents as we can."

K-State never looked back after the Jayhawks gave them a run for their money early in the first game. After leading 11-10, the Wildcats outscored Kansas 19-10 to take game one. Senior outside hitter Lisa Mimick got out to a quick start for the Wildcats, scoring six kills for K-State. The Wildcats cruised over the Jayhawks, with a 30-18 first game win.

"We came out, and we were pumped to play tonight," Mimick said. "It was good to compete well on the road and get a win."

K-State showed that same mentality in the second set as the Wildcats jumped out to a quick lead. Sophomore outside hitter Carl Jensen and senior outside hitter Lisa Mimick led the Wildcats with Mimick pouring in six kills in the game, with Jensen adding four.

Jensen also gave the Wildcats an added edge in the game with a stellar serving attack, including two aces. K-State prevailed in game two by the score of 30-21.

Fritz said she wasn't surprised by Jensen's play.

"The thing I like about CJ is, she goes about things the right way," Fritz said.

"She approaches each game the same way she approaches each practice."

Kansas showed signs of life in the third game, jumping out to an early 6-1 lead. The Jayhawks continued to fight throughout the final game, but K-State's defense stopped the Kansas comeback attempt and took the final game 30-23.

For the Wildcats, it was the tag-team duo of Jensen and Mimick. Both finished with double-doubles, Mimick tallying 15 kills and 13 digs and Jensen adding 12 kills and 12 digs. Jensen also finished with three serving aces.

K-State also stalled the Jayhawk offensive attack with solid defense. The Wildcats tallied 11 blocks and kept Kansas to a negative hitting percentage for the match. Jensen said the team played a consistent match in all phases, which should come as no surprise to Wildcat fans.

"We stayed in system throughout the match and really dominated them," Jensen said. "Anytime we play KU, it is big, so it was good to come out and play our style of volleyball." On the flip side, the Wildcats

K-State senior Liz Wegner knocks down a ball against the University of Kansas on Wednesday night in Lawrence. The Cats won the match in three straights to sweep the season series with their in-state rivals.

sizzled with a .303 hitting percentage and tallied 51 total team kills, doubling the Jayhawks, who only managed 25 kills in the match.

Fritz said she was pleased with the Cats' effort against Kansas. Even though there were several high points in the Wildcats' game, Fritz said the team will continue to work hard in practice to improve as the end of the regular season nears.

"There are things we want to improve on to become a better volleyball team," Fritz said. "But I am proud of the way we competed, and at times, we were a tremendous volleyball team out there."

Men's basketball team will begin season tonight

BY SEAN PURCELL

Kansas State Collegian

Basketball season kicks off Thursday as K-State tips against Global Sports at 7 p.m.

The exhibition game will prove if the Cats are ready for the regular season next Friday. "The objective of these exhibition games, from a coaching standpoint, is to see if the players have grasped what we have done in the first few weeks of practice," K-State head coach Jim Woodriddle said.

"It gives all the players a chance to play against an opponent, and it gives us as coaches a chance to look at combinations of players and see how they respond to each other."

The game also will give players an opportunity to compete against an opponent instead of one another, Woodriddle said.

"The guys really want to get out there and play," Woodriddle said. "Every player will tell you they want to get out there and play, but as coaches, we love practices because that is our classroom and the place where we build our team."

The Wildcats welcome eight newcomers to the team in 2001, and will look for an immediate effect from all of them early as players compete for a few remaining positions.

"We have brought in some kids that bring the kind of intensity we want to see in our system," Woodriddle said. "Everyone is competing harder for positions, because there are still positions to be had."

Woodriddle said the personality of his team has changed dramatically from a year ago. With the team gaining a more competitive edge than in years past, the Wildcat's have stressed the need to build a stronger base.

"We can't win games if we don't build a base right now," Woodriddle said. "So that is what we are doing, and we continue to do that through repetition and practice."

Holiday gives columnist time to reminisce, cook up celebrity holiday costume concepts

Every year, little kids dress up in scary costumes for Halloween.

When I was young, I can remember showing up at doorsteps dressed as a pirate, a ghost, a clown (I was very young, and it was my mom's idea) and various monsters.

But for as many costume ideas that I came up with, many of my friends chose to dress up as different athletes — Joe Montana or Bo Jackson, for instance. All of those sports costumes are not near as scary as what could be marketed this year, though.

So, in the spirit of Halloween and lack of column ideas, I present the scariest sports trick-or-treating ideas.

— Baltimore linebacker Ray Lewis. The costume accessories would be basic — a knife and fake blood. Prison bars would be optional. A Freddy Kruger mask and knife-hand glove would be an interesting creative twist.

If a group of kids are trick-or-treating together, one child could dress as a judge taking a bribe and others could be lawyers with devil-horns on their heads.

— Former Oklahoma linebacker Brian Bosworth. Dress up as two-time Butkus Award winner by having all your friends wear Sooners football jerseys. Then, put on an expensive suit and slink around behind them, occasionally asking to hang out.

— Michael Jordan. The costume would consist of a nursing home gown and walker or cane.

— K-State offensive lineman. Any mummy costume would suffice to represent the plague of injuries suffered by the Cat linemen. A creative twist would be to dress up like Andy Eby by wearing mirrored sunglasses and a Hawaiian shirt.

— The New York Yankees. Have your mom sew a giant fabric $100 bill to wear. Attach emblems of small-market teams such as the Royals and Expos to the soles of your shoes.

— A Fresno State football player. A simple hangman's noose would properly illustrate the Bulldogs' penchant for choking.

— Dennis Rodman. Possibly the costume with the most options. All of the following would be appropriate — fake tattoos, a wedding dress, a boa, wigs of any color, a Bulls jersey, or no clothes at all. The last option probably would be the most fun and raise the most eyebrows.

— Mr. T. Costume items would include a mohawk, hundreds of giant gold chains

Wildcat senior fullback provides leadership, blocking for K-State running attack

BY MICHAEL NOLL

Kansas State Collegian

K-State fullback Rock Cartwright is not a passive player.

First of all, for every first down his running back Josh Scobey earns, Cartwright probably is leveling a defensive player.

"You see it on film," offensive lineman Nick Leckey said. "I wouldn't want to play fullback. There's some plays that you're just like, 'Oh geez, how could you do that?' He's delivering hits. He doesn't take a lot of hits. He's really giving them out most of the time."

Then, if he isn't blocking, Cartwright probably is making the most of his handful of carries or catch opportunities.

So far this season, Cartwright has averaged 4.8 yards carrying the ball and 9.3 yards catching it. Against Texas A&M, he turned in an acrobatic one-handed catch on the sideline on the Aggie five-yard line.

Cartwright described that play in a modest fashion.

"Jesus Christ has given me the talent to play some ball, and the guy hit me when I was open, and I was able to catch the ball, and I was able to get my feet in," he said. "It doesn't surprise me because I expect that out of myself. I expect to be a playmaker, so I try to do what I can do."

And doing is exactly what Cartwright does best. Every time the ball is snapped, Cartwright is making a play somewhere so that someone, usually Scobey, can make a play of his own.

"I just try to do what I can do just to let Josh get out there and do what he can do and let him shine a little bit," Cartwright said.

"I know if I don't do my job, Josh doesn't get the yards he needs to get. As far as myself, I'm going to do what I do the best that I can do so he can get those yards. Those 200 yards that he gained against KU, I figure I did a pretty good job."

Because of the nature of his job, Cartwright might not always get the credit he's due. When Scobey ran for 204 yards against Kansas last Saturday, Cartwright's name didn't come up that much. Scobey, however, knows just how important his fullback is to his success.

"He does a good job. He goes in there and puts his head down and opens holes for me," Scobey said. "He's a great blocker, and I truly respect what he does. I don't know how successful we'd be without him. He's so important to this offense, and he's such a major ingredient to the running game."

The bond between the two backs goes beyond the field as well. The two room together on road games and have become friends since they both arrived at K-State last season.

"Rock is one of my best friends, and he's the closest friend that I have on this team," Scobey said. "Me and Rock, we go places together. We do things together. It's more than him just being my fullback. He's like a brother to me."

Mike Shepherd/Collegian

Senior fullback Rock Cartwright breaks through the line against Southern California on Sept. 8. Cartwright has been a steady blocker for the Cats this year, springing Josh Scobey for several gains.

That friendship also translates into solid play no matter how the team is performing.

"It's like we're going out there, and we feel like we've got to get it done," Scobey said. "If no one else gets it done, me and him have to get it done. That's just how we feel every Saturday. We always feel like we've got each other's back, no matter what happens or what goes down."

That kind of work ethic also has made leadership easier for the two running backs.

"Those two guys probably lead by example more, but when they need to step up and talk, I believe they do it," running backs coach Michael Smith said. "The offensive line kind of respects that because they don't want to be yelled at by guys that are making bad reads or not running hard."

So far this season, the duo has run hard and physically worn defenses down by constantly pounding on them. Scobey has said he gets stronger the more he carries the ball, and the same is true for Cartwright, Smith said.

"You run up in there as a linebacker and clamp in with him. It wears on you. It wears on you a lot," Smith said. "When you get pounded like that, and we're able to run the ball the way we've been running it, later in the game, those linebackers don't like running up in there too much."

"It shows on the tapes. Rock is going in there and throwing his body around, and the offensive linemen are doing the same. Later in the game, those guys are wore out, and it's a done deal. It's good to see. That means we're having success."

Such solid, physical performances also could lead to individual success for Cartwright in the NFL.

"Scouts have been here the last four or five weeks, and they ask about him," Smith said. "He thinks he's going to get slighted because of his height. I just tell him to just keep doing what you're doing, and somebody's going to get you into camp."

Even if Cartwright enters camp as a free agent, he still can make the best of his opportunity.

"Not a lot of people get the chance to do something they love and get paid a lot of money for it. Once you get in there, I always say, that's all you now," Smith said.

"Somebody's giving you that opportunity. I think Rock's got as good a chance as anybody on the team."

Play examines life trials of black Americans

By JJ Duncan
Kansas State Collegian

From drag queens to dead soldiers, "The Colored Museum" celebrates the pains and the delights of black American culture.

The production, put on by Ebony Theatre Company, opens Thursday and is made up of several vignettes that satirically profile a different piece of modern black America. All of the short pieces make up one script written by George C. Wolfe in 1986.

Director Nathan Jackson, senior in theater, said he identifies with much of what Wolfe says in the script.

"There's a lot of points in the script that he tries to make that I'm in total agreement with," he said. "It's one of the best scripts written by an African American playwright ever."

The play attacks stereotypes while promoting a strong personal identity.

"The main message, and this sounds cheesy as hell, but it's that no one can tell you how to be you," Jackson said. "No one can tell you how to be black."

"You are you, and you can't hide from that — you can't run from it. That's a universal message."

The characters of the play represent a broad spectrum of black Americans. Jackson plays a drag queen named Miss Rog, and Tyler Woods, junior in music education and theater, cross-dresses to play Aunt Ethel, a cook who is a parody of Aunt Jemima.

Woods, who also is the music director for the play, said this is his first Ebony Theatre production. As Aunt Ethel, Woods names off some of the ingredients that make up who black people are, such as style, rhythm, salty language, humor, survival and attitude.

"The play is a way of laughing at ourselves while embracing the things that make up who we are today," he said.

To get the right attitude for the character, Woods said he drew on the stories from his mother's past about his grandmother. While it is a humorous piece, Woods said a lot of pain is carried in the message as well.

"I hope people come away with a better understanding of black humor. I hope they walk away entertained and with a better understanding of black thinking," he said. "It's a very interesting multi-cultural experience."

Though the message of the play is serious, it still makes people laugh, which makes people think about why they're laughing at the subject matter. Maia Robinson, freshman in theater, said Robinson is in two of the pieces in the play, and she said she hopes it changes the way people look at things.

"I want them to go home thinking about how they can better themselves and change stereotypes and how they can change how some cultures are viewed negatively," she said.

T.J. Anderson, junior in theater, plays a man who is throwing away the things that make up his past and battling with his inner child over who he was and what he has become.

"The man is a challenge because he basically stands for a lot of stuff I don't," he said.

It is important to scrutinize the humor in the play to get the full meaning, Anderson said.

"The play is funny but symbolic. It has an underlying message," he said. "With this play, don't just laugh at the joke — ask why it's told."

Experience Ebony

Ebony Theatre presents "The Colored Museum" at 8 p.m. Thursday through Saturday with an additional 2 p.m. showing Saturday in the Purple Masque Theatre. Admission is $4 for students and $6 for the general public.

Through different characters and pieces, the play arouses controversial issues. For instance, in one of the pieces, a man is brought out in a plain white mask with a blonde wig. In the piece where the man fights with his inner child, he is throwing away the things that make him black.

Karen Mikols/Collegian

Through these examples and others, the gap between races is an issue addressed in the play, and Jackson said that although it's a more volatile issue, it shouldn't be avoided.

"With the nice gap, I don't want to be too sensitive, because there is a race gap, and we do behave differently within those cultures," he said. "So I say, 'Let's show that.' I don't want to be color blind."

A World of Tea is a comprehensive site for those interested in all things involving those invigorating little leaves we put in water. Did you know that black tea, green tea and oolong tea are the three basic types of tea? Well, the site tells what all of that means and is helpful for people who want to understand why they like a certain kind of tea or want to find a decent recipe.

The site is full of interesting little tidbits of tea information such as quotes about tea, like this one from Eleanor Roosevelt, "Women are like tea bags. They don't know how strong they are until they get into hot water."

Jimmy Fallon.com is a site full of Jimmy junkies putting up pictures, experiences and transcripts all pertaining to the guitar-toting Saturday Night Live star.

While the site borders on the obsessive side, it's still an interesting read for Fallon fans. Transcripts from interviews and skits, song lyrics and a biography are all included on the site. Fans can even chat with each other about the singer and comedian.

The site also has tour dates, so in all, it's got all the right information for one of the best fan sites on Fallon.

MALLS

"My dad works at Bramlage and told me Fright Night would be safe and fun," said Christie Haney, mother of three daughters, "so we went there instead. With everything going on, I wanted to stay away from the mall. You can never be too careful."

Although the Halloween attack has been disproven, Linda Richter, K-State professor of political science and expert on terrorism, said the theory behind it isn't off base at all.

Citing Pulitzer Prize winning author Laurie Garrett and her book "Betrayal of Trust: The Decline of Global Public Health," Richter said malls would be an easy target and should be seriously evaluated during America's war against terrorism.

"She makes a rather persuasive case," Richter said. "You can't just dismiss something. Biological warfare in a mall makes a certain amount of sense. It's not all hype."

Richter said Garrett's analysis of the possibilities of a biological weapon being placed in a large regional mall during a holiday season was very believable considering a mall's vulnerabilities.

"Anthrax is not contagious," she said. "Should something of a biological nature get into a mall at Christmas time, you would have a much more dangerous situation. As the holiday season approaches, we'll see some hoaxes and, unfortunately, some real problems with the malls."

Multiple numbers of exits, the sheer difficulties of tracking everyone going in and out and the nature of mall ventilation systems make it a critical concern.

"You can beef up security at the Supreme Court," she said. "There, you're dealing with a couple of exits. You can't stop everyone and search all the Tonka trucks in a mall."

Richter said she isn't leery of Manhattan's shopping facilities, but said she might think twice before entering large malls, such as The Mall of America in Minneapolis.

As for the e-mail, Richter said mass, specific warnings are harder to believe.

"This is naturally making people jumpy," she said. "But the greater the specifics, the lesser the likelihood. Terrorists like the element of surprise."

ASBESTOS

Galitzer said the non-friable material is being reburied.

"We will leave it there, and it will be identified," he said. "We can't sift through all the soil to get it all. It will put more people at risk than leaving it there."

Asbestos, a mineral fiber that was once commonly used in building construction materials, can be hazardous to someone's health if inhaled. It can increase the risk of lung cancer; mesothelioma, a rare cancer of the chest and abdominal lining; and asbestosis, potentially fatal lung scarring. Symptoms of the diseases usually do not show up until 15 to 20 years after exposure begins.

Gerald Carter, director of facilities planning and university architect, said a piece of history of the K-State campus was unearthed.

"In going back through the archives and checking the records of the area, the grade was three and a half to four feet lower than it is now," he said.

Between 1890 and the end of the 1920s, a road was constructed using materials produced in the East Seaton Foundry.

The foundry was in what was then called Mechanical Engineering Hall. Iron waste and coal waste, called slag and clinkers, were used as road bases, because they are heavy, dense and can support a lot of weight. Asbestos was included in the slag and clinkers.

Carter said the materials had not been found before, because the materials are deep in the grade.

"When the Union was created in the 60s, fill was brought in to raise the grade. It added a fair amount of dirt. We didn't need to be digging into the old dirt bed," he said. "We just needed to remove the old road. We removed the top concrete and put dirt on top of it."

Carter said identification and removal of the asbestos will not delay work on the memorial.

ECONOMY

made new revenue estimates in April, there was a $206 million gap between spending legislators had approved for fiscal 2002 and expected tax collections.

"K-State's already underfunded," Peterson said. "We can't do without anything. It's essential we pay for lights and air conditioning."

Edwin Olson, a retired K-State professor of economics who's on the Consensus Estimating Group that makes state revenue estimates, said the group is more uncertain at this point than they've been in past years.

While he said Kansas' response to a recession ranks in the upper third of all states, there's still a lot to factor in.

Since Sept. 11, a study in the Kansas City area showed retail sales are below expectations, and interest in purchasing houses has slowed.

State layoffs in aircraft manufacturing and telecommunications likely will have negative effects on state income and taxes derived.

Kansas Gov. Bill Graves' staff previously assumed the state would collect between $100 million and $130 million more in revenues in fiscal 2003 compared to fiscal 2002. But last week, state budget director Duane Goossen said the $110 to $130 million revenue could evaporate.

Yet Peterson said she'll push for an increase in higher education funding.

"We already had a hiring freeze last year, and we were limited in filling positions," she said.

And with the increase in enrollment, K-State has more needs.

"There are more people here, and more people equals more cost," she said.

Since state funds make up 34 percent of the university's budget, Peterson said options for more money are limited. Increasing tuition more than planned is not something K-State wants to do, she said.

Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, said increasing education taxes will be an option for additional revenue.

"We have no options that people will like. It's a question of picking between objectionable objects," Glasscock said.

He said he won't be surprised if both fiscal 2002 and 2003 budgets are aggressively revised downward.

"We will have to find new revenue to avoid a very, very punishing year," he said.

— Chiefs head coach Dick Vermeil. Take a page from the old Batman series and dress as the Riddler because you don't have a clue how to turn around a football team.

— Nebraska quarterback Eric

Crouch. Wear a Nebraska jersey, tie tiny jets to your shoes, and paint the word "Team" on a football. Then, walk from door to door carrying the football.

— A state of Kansas fair-weather fan. Wear a K-State football jersey with both the words "Dunn" and "Roberson" stitched on the back. Then, wear KU basketball tear-away shorts. Boogie is optional.

— Finally, Bill Snyder or Jim Woodriddle. Simply dress in a conventional angel outfit with a halo. When folks ask you why you chose that attire, say something like, "I'm dressing as the savior of down-and-out programs."

military communications system that commanders in the field are having trouble summoning new supplies and troop reinforcements.

"We believe that puts a terrific amount of stress on their military capability," he said.

Victoria Clarke, spokeswoman for Defense Secretary Donald H.

Rumsfeld, said he had notified the White House that the reserve call-up would exceed 50,000, but she offered no new projected total.

"We're not benchmarking it," she said.

Under the authorization signed by President Bush three days after the Sept. 11 attacks, the Pentagon could activate as many as 1 million reservists. Clarke said she did not expect the total would approach that figure. During the 1991 Gulf War, more than 260,000 reservists were called up.

Clarke said Rumsfeld would fly to Central Asia to consult with governments supporting the U.S. effort in Afghanistan. She would not identify his destinations except to say he also would visit Moscow for talks with Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov on arms control and anti-terror matters.

In early October, Rumsfeld visited U.S. allies in the Persian Gulf as well as Egypt and Uzbekistan, where he worked out an arrangement for the use of an Uzbek air base by American troops.

My Favorite Workout

When Amy Shearer from Kansas City, Kansas wants to relieve stress, she comes to the Rec Complex. Shearer, a sophomore in life sciences, relieves stress by running two miles, lifting weights, using the cybex machines and participating in kickboxing sessions. Shearer likes to work out and has been coming to the Rec for a year, and sometimes she works out with her friends. "It depends on my mood when I decide to come alone or with my friends," said Shearer. Besides working out at the Rec, Shearer also enjoys other forms of exercise such as cross-country running and biking. When asked what she likes most about the Rec experience, Shearer had a reply that represents what the Rec experience is all about. "I like the variety and the appeal," said Shearer. "There are many physical and social aspects of the Rec that I enjoy." Shearer keeps her motivation to train by wanting to stay healthy and in shape. "I like nutrition and I like to be healthy," said Shearer. "If I don't work out I feel like a bum!" Besides attending the kickboxing session regularly, Shearer also really likes the rock-climbing wall. When asked what advice she would give other Rec goers, Shearer replied, "Find something that you enjoy doing." Shearer also added, "This place can be a great stress reliever."

Colleen Pointer, a senior from Springfield, Virginia, has been a Rec employee since last November. Pointer, a fitness consultant for the Wellness Resource Center, agrees that this position is a good way to get experience in her field. Pointer is majoring in Nutrition Exercise Science and Dietetics. "This is what I want to do long-term," said Pointer, "and this position gives me good practice for the real world. I spend a lot of time here anyway, and this is a place to gain experience for the type of career I am pursuing", said Pointer. Pointer also enjoys working at the Rec because it is a great way to meet people. "You get to meet a lot of people and interact with them," said Pointer. "It is almost like being part of a family." Pointer will graduate in December and plans to go on to pursue her masters in Food and Nutrition. She would also like to receive a dietetic internship. When asked what she has learned from working at the Rec, Pointer replied, "I have learned to be flexible and how to work with various types of people." Pointer also added, "I have learned great client interaction."

Pool Action

As Fall approaches and the weather begins to change, it may be time to move your form of exercise inside. Don't forget about the Natatorium and the many benefits of exercising in the water! Wildcat Waterworks sessions of aqua aerobics and deep water jogging both help to improve strength, flexibility and definition of your muscles, as well as improving the condition of your cardiovascular system. In addition, these classes are a great way to take a break from studying, meet new friends, and feel great inside and out!

Weight Training Tip

To build strong, muscular calves, try the "step up" exercise. Stand on a step or stairway on the balls of your feet, leaving the rest of your foot off. Use a wall to balance yourself so you don't fall. Rise onto your toes slowly as high as you can and hold for the count of three. Lower your heels below the step. Using your calf muscles, push up onto your toes again and lower. Repeat 10 to 12 times. Add another set as you get stronger.

Nutrition Notes

Root for Fall Veggies

You might know that pumpkin, squash, rutabagas and beets are veggies with versatility and nutrition. But, knowing how to use them is another issue. Fall vegetables make good beginnings for casseroles, stews and even soups. Pumpkin is, of course, the center of pumpkin pie, but it also fills a soup, flavors muffins and can be mashed like potatoes. The various types of squash work in stir-fries, pasta dishes, casseroles, and even a base for other veggies when you use spaghetti squash. Beets have a mild flavor so they can be combined with stronger flavored veggies in salads, pasta dishes, or roasted with potatoes, carrots, or served steamed just as they are. In addition to variety and color, these vegetables provide vitamins A and C, potassium, phosphorus and fiber. So add these veggies to help you get your five-a-day.

Military families affected by attacks

BY SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

Military life is nothing new to Colleen Pointer.

The 22-year-old army kid has moved 11 times. She's lived on bases nearly her whole life. And she's the daughter of a top army lawyer in Europe.

But nothing could prepare Pointer for Sept. 11.

"It's really hard," she said. "It hit close to home."

Pointer, senior in nutrition/exercise science and dietetics, knew what would follow — the public's call to send U.S. troops immediately and declare war. People would want retaliation.

But Pointer also knew the flipside of sending troops.

"People don't take into consideration the number of casualties," she said. "People don't understand the families affected by this. It's easy to say, 'Yeah, send them over,' but it's hard."

Heidi Zimmerman, senior in art, knows how hard it can be when a loved one is deployed overseas.

Zimmerman's fiancé is stationed at Camp Pendleton in California and is a medic for the U.S. Marines. She believes he now is in East Timor, but he was in the Middle East only a couple of weeks ago.

"You never know with what's going on in Afghanistan," she said.

"Things can totally change day to day."

AMERICA RESPONDS

At Fort Riley, the Soldier and Family Support Center provides people with the help they need, including computer and e-mail access, televisions and on-site counselors to provide support during deployments.

Bess Stone, family readiness coordinator, said people respond differently when their loved ones are deployed.

"A lot of families do well during times of deployment. They rely on friends and the center," she said.

"For a lot of people, the every day stressors are hard when you can't rely on your significant others."

Stone said she advises people not to overload their spouses with all the day-to-day problems.

This is easy to do with instant communication, such as telephones and e-mail.

"Just keep in mind that it's hard for soldiers to worry about things going on back at home," she said.

"But try and solve those problems locally instead of taking them to the battlefield. The soldiers have more important things to worry about."

Cookout for the Cats

Event encourages fan involvement in basketball

BY SARAH RICE
Kansas State Collegian

Students who participated in the Cat Town Cookout enjoyed a free dinner and the chance to speak with men's basketball coach Jim Wooldridge.

Mike Mores, assistant director of promotions, said his office was looking for a way to get students excited about the basketball season starting with the first game.

"We are just trying to get more student involvement in basketball," he said. "We are hoping students will grab these first five non-conference games and run with it."

Students with season tickets were invited to attend, the event which began at 5:30 p.m. in Brandeberry Complex.

Mores said they decided to focus on students rather than the general public because of the enthusiasm they bring to games.

"We targeted students because they are the loudest," he said. "They are the ones who get the atmosphere in Bramlage going," he said.

Athletic Director Tim Weiser was behind the table, serving hot dogs.

"It's important for us because we want to get students involved in basketball like football," he said. "I am also getting a chance to chat with students I wouldn't otherwise get the chance to speak to."

Wooldridge insisted he be involved in the event and was grateful for the opportunity to thank the fans.

"This is the absolute core of our fan base," he said. "We can't sit in our office and expect people to support us. We have to go to them."

Wooldridge spoke to the students and told them one way to bring back the strong tradition of K-State basketball, including Final Four appearances, would be to fill Bramlage Coliseum.

"We are trying to rebuild what is and was," he said. "One of the ways we can bring it back is for this gymnasium to be full."

"Do everything you can do to support basketball. Do everything you can do to create the environment we need to win games. You can be the sixth man," Wooldridge said.

Students said they were optimistic about the upcoming season. Nick Sobba, sophomore in mass communications, said he was confident about the basketball program's future.

"Wooldridge is going to get it turned around," Sobba said. "We have a lot of people who were young last year who got experience."

Matt Burgardt, sophomore in marketing and finance, said the event was impressive.

"It's good that Coach could come out and meet students," he said. "It got everyone fired up about basketball. We definitely need support and to fill the stadium."

The free food, however, was what attracted most attendees.

"It got a lot of people out here that wouldn't necessarily come," said Anne Bacon, junior in apparel and textile marketing.

Matt Carpenter, hot dog cook and intern for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, said he was happy with the event, but disappointed more students didn't attend.

"I wish there were more students, but we take what we can get," he said.

Athletic Director Tim Weiser, serves hot dogs to students Thursday night at the Cat Town Cookout. Season ticket holders were able to receive a free meal before K-State's game against Global Sports. Weiser is in his first year at the position after coming to K-State from Colorado State University. About 200 people attended the cookout.

U.S. anthrax scares spread West; spores found in Kansas City, Mo.

Anthrax found closer to K-State not changing University's safety plans

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Even though no one was infected, anthrax spores found at a Kansas City, Mo., postal facility caused more than 120 employees to take antibiotics Thursday as a precautionary action, postal officials said.

Gary Stone, Stamp Fulfillment Services Center manager, said the contaminated mail was separated from general circulation and did not touch any mail that would end up in someone's home.

Ronnie Grice, director of K-State public safety, said even though anthrax sightings are occurring closer to campus, there are not many more security precautions that can be taken.

"There is no indication that action will be directed toward us," Grice said.

"We can only tell everyone to stick with the same safety measures we have addressed in the past couple weeks."

He said Campus Police presented a safety demonstration to workers at campus mail last week.

During the presentation, campus police officers asked workers to examine all mail, but to keep an eye out for strange mail, such as envelopes without a return address.

"We've already had last week's training," he said. "We asked them to make sure they wash their hands after they touch mail. They need to be aware of everything their hands contact while handling mail."

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The fear of anthrax spread to the Midwest on Thursday with a preliminary finding of contamination at a Kansas City, Mo., postal facility. Investigators established a link between the death of a woman in New York and more than a dozen cases of the disease elsewhere in the country.

The bacteria that killed Kathy L. Nguyen were indistinguishable from all the others, including the strain in a letter to Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle, said Dr. Steven Ostroff of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Officials said they had not yet learned how the woman became sick.

Nearly one month into America's bioterrorism scare, the threat seemed to be receding in the nation's capital as the Supreme Court reopened to employees on Friday. But New Jersey asked the Bush administration for hurry-up help in testing more than 1,000 postal facilities. It appears the state "is the front line of the anthrax attack on our nation," acting Gov. Donald T. DiFrancesco wrote.

In a cruel irony, officials said the suspected spores found in Kansas City, Mo., had likely been exported from the nation's capital.

"The assumption at this point is that this is a contamination process from Brentwood," the main postal facility in Washington that has been shut down for more than a week, said Rex Archer, Kansas City health director. The idea is that spores settled out of the air and got on these envelopes.

The preliminary test results at a specialty postal facility — coupled with the discovery of spores at a private Indiana company — marked the first known spread of spores off the East Coast in the nation's month-long struggle with bioterrorism.

More than 170 area postal workers in the Kansas City area joined thousands of other Americans on antibiotics and local officials moved quickly to reassure the public.

The positive test results came from swabs taken on two bags of employees' trash in the first-day cancellation section of the Stamp Fulfillment Center, Gary Stone, the facility's manager, said. At a news conference, he said the affected portion of the facility had been closed and that it had its own ventilation system.

"The mail that we found and sequestered, which is where the samples tested positive, did not come through the mail stream with any letter that might end up in your home," he said.

In Florida, anthrax was found in a sixth post office, prompting local officials to speculate that more than one letter was sent to the publishing company where the bioterror campaign first appeared.

Officials disclosed the presence of a small amount of anthrax on a printer in a private mail maintenance center in Indiana on Wednesday. Peter Beering, terrorism preparedness coordinator for Indianapolis and Marion County, said the printer was among several items shipped to the firm

Halloween dance in Salina to benefit NYC firefighters

The Leadership Training Seminar Class at the K-State-Salina campus will be host to a Post-Halloween dance from 9 p.m. to 12 a.m. tonight at the K-State Salina Recreation Center.

The dance was organized by six students in the leadership class as part of a group project to encourage student involvement and civic responsibility. All proceeds will be donated to the New York City firefighters.

Rochelle Baum, freshman in airway science, was one of the students involved. She said she was proud of her group's efforts in putting together and organizing tonight's dance.

"We all came together. If it wasn't for everyone in the group, this wouldn't have been accomplished," Baum said.

The event is open to all K-State, Kansas Wesleyan and Bethany College students. Everyone is encouraged to wear a Halloween costume. A $5 donation is requested, and you must have your student I.D. to enter.

A live performance by Ruskabank will highlight the dance. The eight-member Manhattan band will play from 9 to 10 p.m. and will feature ska music.

Some of the other events at the dance will include DJ Dave Swanson from 10 p.m. to midnight, free drinks from Pepsi Cola, and snacks and prizes from various businesses in the Salina area.

Former WCW wrestlers to come to campus Monday

Phi Gamma Delta fraternity will be host to a professional wrestling event Monday as part of fund-raising efforts for the New York Relief fund.

Georgia Championship Wrestling is coming to Weber Arena and will feature former World Championship Wrestling stars Marcus "Bull" Bagwell and Jeff Jarrett.

Fiji member Travis Stiles helped coordinate the event with Georgia Championship Wrestling.

"It's the first time anything like this has been done on campus," Stiles said.

The two-hour event, Stiles said, is well worth the $15 ticket cost.

"We know that it's kind of expensive for college students," he said, "but this is pretty cheap considering you're getting the same quality type of show you would see watching 'Monday Nitro' or 'Raw.'"

Stiles expects the event to be successful. KJCK-FM 94.5 also will be broadcasting live from the event.

"We're also having a contest for fraternities, sororities and residence halls," he said.

"The group with the highest percentage of people who buy tickets will get to do a tag-team with Bagwell and Jarrett. The two DJs from 94.5 also will be in a tag-team match. It should be lots of fun."

A portion of the proceeds will go to Fiji, who then will donate all money to the New York Relief Fund. Tickets can be purchased at Fiji's table in the K-State Student Union Plaza this week, or call 395-0996 for tickets.

STATE IN BRIEF

State attorney general enters race for governor

TOPEKA — Attorney General Carla Stovall is running for governor.

Stovall told reporters Thursday she will kick off her campaign for the 2002 Republican nomination later this month. She also said she will name her running-mate then.

She entered the race at a time when many Republicans who consider themselves moderates were hoping events would leave them with one candidate to face: State Treasurer Tim Shallenbarger, a conservative who kicked off his campaign this week.

Stovall's entry raised questions about whether House Speaker Kent Glasscock, another moderate, will stay in the race. Glasscock said he would, but speculation about his future remained.

The attorney general is likely to be a formidable candidate. She won reelection in 1998 with 75 percent of the vote, the largest margin of any statewide candidate that year.

INS incapable of tracking illegal immigrants in U.S.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The government does not know how many foreigners are in the United States illegally, federal officials told lawmakers Wednesday. Many international students remain in the United States after their student visas expire, or they never get to the schools where they are to study.

A lax tracking system means neither the State Department nor the Immigration and Naturalization Service can say how widespread the abuse of the student visa program is, agency officials told two House Education and Workforce subcommittees.

Hani Hanjour, suspected in the hijacking of the airliner that crashed into the Pentagon on Sept. 11, entered the United States on a student visa after promising to enroll at Holy Name College in Oakland, Calif. He failed to appear there.

The INS has only about 2,000 investigators, half of whom are working on the attacks case, said the agency's acting deputy commissioner, Michael Becraft. That focus leaves few investigators to handle the agency's regular load, much less, chase after foreign students who stay here too long or do not attend classes, he said.

ASK THE FINANCIAL PLANNERS

Dear Financial Planners,

I just applied for automobile insurance in my own name. In the past I was on my parents' policy. The insurance agent that I talked to indicated the insurance company would be checking my driving record and credit rating. I didn't think an insurance company could check my credit rating. Is this legal?

Dear Student,

Checking credit reports by insurance companies is becoming increasingly widespread. The insurance industry argues there is a link between the number of accidents and claims filed and a person's credit rating. Specifically, those with worse credit reports tend to be the same people who file insurance claims.

Insurance companies don't like to see late payments, credit defaults, bankruptcies, or large lines of credit available. Consumers with bad ratings might be rejected by insurance companies or end up paying the highest premiums. On the other hand, if a person's credit rating is perfect, an insurance company might lower annual premiums. If you are turned down because of a bad credit rating, you may request a free credit report. You also may request assistance from the Kansas Insurance Commissioner at (785) 296-3071.

Comedy show tickets sold out

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

All three performances for The Second City this weekend are sold out.

Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer for McCain Auditorium, said tickets for the touring comedy and improvisation group ran dry sometime this week.

"The shows are sold out. There are no tickets left," Jackson said.

Jackson said that as of Monday, there were a mere 40 tickets left. By Thursday, those 40 were gone.

Richard Martin, McCain director, said this should teach students a lesson.

"Buy your tickets early. Don't wait until the last minute," he said.

Performances for The Second City will be at 8 tonight and 7 p.m. and 9:30 p.m. Saturday in Nichols Theatre. The performances will be in Nichols because of the scheduling conflict with "The Crucible" being shown in McCain next weekend.

In addition, Martin said, it is more beneficial to have the performances in Nichols because of the show itself.

"I think it's nice for the performers to have a smaller space, and the audience appreciates the intimacy of Nichols Theatre," Martin said.

The intimate space of Nichols Theatre, which seats 250, will allow the performers of The Second City to interact with audience members, Jackson said. The show will engage the audience and encourage participation.

"The audience actually will provide some of the words used for the skits," Jackson said.

The show, which includes satirical skits like those on "Saturday Night Live," came to campus last year, and its alumni include such comical actors as Gilda Radner, James Belushi and Julia Louis-Dreyfus. The rotating cast looks for the hottest up-and-coming comedians for its show.

A show associated with such big names is sure to mean fun for its audiences, Martin said.

"It's pure entertainment with no educational value at all," he said. "People will see what kinds of skits and situations the troupe can get itself into and out of by giving the audience a real good time."

Jackson said the performances will supply good, old-fashioned belly laughs.

"They're looking for something to laugh at," he said. "We've been serious for far too long. There comes a time when you have to laugh or you'll go insane."

Lectures help patrons interpret art

BY MAGGIE GRUSZNIS
Kansas State Collegian

The focus of the "Arts Above the Arch," on Thursday night at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art was to teach adults how to teach children to appreciate and interpret art.

Every other Thursday, Katherine Walker Schlageck, education and public service supervisor for the museum, conducts "Arts Above the Arch" lectures and workshops in the UMB Theatre at the museum.

"The idea of this is for anyone to learn more about art," Schlageck said.

Schlageck talked to the audience about how to present art to children in a way they will understand and appreciate. Schlageck told the audience their interaction with children is very important.

"For this to work, you all have to pretend you are kids," Schlageck said.

Schlageck went through two different paintings during her presentation. She asked the audience a series of descriptive questions for each painting and let them respond.

"The longer you look, the more things you'll see in this," Schlageck said.

Schlageck said it is a good idea to tell kids to write down everything they saw in the painting because it would help them understand the artwork.

The museum uses the Edmund Burke Feldman's Aesthetic Criticism method of looking at art.

Jenny Braniff/Collegian

Katherine Walker Schlageck, education and public service supervisor for the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, teaches a program about art and aesthetics. The painting was critiqued for its sense of perspective and quality.

Schlageck said it was important to use the same method because children will familiarize themselves with the method. Children also will organize questions and information logically by providing a similar framework for looking at art.

After Schlageck's lecture, the audience divided into five groups and moved into the Donna Lindsey Vanier Gallery.

In the gallery, Schlageck explained the five ways to approach looking at artwork — aesthetic, narrative, logical/quantitative, foundational and experiential quests.

She said these quests were important because each child will approach art differently. Each of the five groups approached a painting by Thomas Hart Benton and discussed it based on the five quests.

She wanted each participant to notice the differences and similarities in their answers.

Gina Diller, a picture person for the Seven Dolors Child Care Center, came to learn more about art and to get hands-on ideas for children participation. Schlageck showed Diller and the rest of her audience all sorts of things children can do with art.

Schlageck said people should make the art relate to themselves by what she showed them in her interactive lecture.

"I have never been exposed to art until recently. I've seen many different types of art and am beginning to like it," Andy Kowal, freshman in industrial engineering, said. "It's beginning to grow on me."

Local laundromat pick-up lines help patrons in finding clean fun

Laundry is one of the inevitable evils of the world. Just when you get baskets of completed laundry, smelling clean and fresh, before you turn around, it is time to complete it again. It is not even doing the laundry that is so bad it, is having to pack it up and take it to the laundromat that is such a hassle. The question is, how many hours of your life have you lost to the laundromat?

Because students spend so much time doing laundry, it is logical, it might be a good place to look for a mate. The Editorial Board delineates the best pick-up lines they've heard at a laundromat. Michelle Bertuglia: Want to test my spin cycle? Jamie Barrett: Is that static cling or are you happy to see me? Dan Smith: How you doin'? Nick Bratkovic: Clothes spinning sure makes you think, so can I have your e-mail address or phone number? Corbin H. Crable: Watch out. If you put it in hot water, it shrinks. Jessica Pitts: If we put our socks together, we could be the perfect pair. April Middleton: Want to meet here tomorrow after we rumple those sheets tonight? Bryan Scribner: Do you have change for a dollar?

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

The chick walking around in the Union dressed like a butterfly is so hot.

The Fourum is an art form.

How about not wearing socks with sandals? Not only does it defeat the purpose of wearing sandals, but it looks really tacky.

Dave Pious, I can't believe you actually think we are going to a bowl game. The only bowl game we are going to is the toilet bowl.

It is about, time. There is a Manhattan band without box at the end of their name. Maybe this one will be good.

I kind of think the guy pushing computers around on campus with his winter coat and shorts is kinda cute.

Real men can handle Kansas weather in shorts. Those who whine are nothing more than mommy's nancy boys.

You must pace yourself when performing sexual favors.

Regarding the whole cell phone issue: when someone is next to you on a machine and talking loudly and obnoxiously so much that it interrupts your exercising, it does become your business.

So, what does it mean when you and your roommates start growing mold in your room and name it Buddy?

John Graham, you were my hero. Not anymore. Sellout.

Current van usage policy in need of revision by KSU

Editor,

The current K-State Policies and Procedures Manual, Van Policy on Usage of 15-passenger Vans, Chapter 6450, issued Aug. 24 allows for unsafe operation at both minimum/maximum capacity and for rural/highway operation.

In April, the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA) issued a safety letter to K-State warning against possible rollover of fully loaded 15-passenger vans at high rates of speed. The letter cited various tests where the NHTSA test driver stopped testing below 60 mph due to safety concerns. Additional factors leading to loss of control and rollovers included increased center of gravity by using roof racks and over correcting or excessive steering at freeway speeds.

K-State's policy allows 15-passenger vans to operate fully loaded on campus and within 10 miles of campus. This exception was entered into the current policy due to departments' complaining of increased finances supporting more vans and the increased operating burden for short field trips and other local business.

The vans may be operated at 60 mph on rural roads and posted limits on major highways. K-State's policy does require all van drivers to complete the "Coaching the Van Driver II" course by Nov. 1. However, there is no central department in charge of ensuring that all departments have complied.

I am not insinuating that individual departments would allow an uncertified driver to operate a van in an emergency or prior to safety course completion, but there is no system of checks and balances.

Also, the written course is excellent, but needs a hands-on driving test of the rollover-prone van prior to embarking on that first field trip with K-State students and gear.

The solution is to fully comply with the NHTSA report and simply reduce the safety risks. Reduce the maximum number of passengers to 12 for all events. Eliminate all roof racks with gear being stored/secured inside the van. Reduce the maximum speed to 55 mph on rural roads and 60 mph on major highways. Expand the K-State Facilities drivers' safety course to include a road test. Require all departments to report to K-State Facilities upon completion of the driver's course.

K-State has an excellent history for not having a fatal accident involving the 15-passenger van. By reducing the safety risks, K-State greatly increases everyone's safety.

A place in paradise

Proposed parking solution provides alternative to campuswide problem

Imagine a day at K-State free from the struggle of parking. A place where finding a parking space is so easy it could be called a "purple parking paradise."

This paradise is not a mirage. It is an oasis just a short jaunt from campus.

Imagine each commuter will leave the confines of his or her car, smiling. The commuter will casually stoop and pick up a copy of the Collegian. Then, a shuttle service will deliver the commuter directly to the front door of a building on campus.

Imagine, no more lot sharking, no more flipping off other drivers, no more yelling obscenities for swooping in on a coveted spot. There will be no polluting the environment from drivers' vehicles idling in the crowded lots for hours. When you enter this purple parking paradise, these negatives will be eliminated.

Sound too good to be true? Well, it isn't. Such a paradise already is available at K-State. Each and every day K-State classes are in session.

Parking Services gives students the opportunity to take advantage of the purple parking paradise.

Here are the requirements.

First, you must have a valid parking permit, be it 'O', 'W', etc. Second, you must know your schedule. Third, you must be willing to participate in public transportation.

my view

Zac Cook

Let's assume you are a student, faculty or staff member who has a valid parking permit and needs to be on campus at 9:30 a.m. and finish class/work at 4 p.m. Sit down at the computer and point your browser to www.ksu.edu/parking/shuttle.htm.

You will see this free shuttle service runs from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. when classes are in session. You will notice the shuttle runs from the KSU Foundation to the K-State Student Union every 30 minutes, on the hour and half-hour. Also, notice that the shuttle runs from the Union to KSU Foundation every 30 minutes, at 23 minutes and 53 minutes after the hour.

Drive to the K-State Foundation Building at 2323 Anderson Ave., at 8:55 a.m. Don't worry about arriving too early because the K-State Foundation building averages 100 open parking spaces every day. Once there, park in a lot behind the building and walk around front to the shuttle stop.

Pick up a copy of the Collegian and browse until the shuttle arrives promptly at 9 a.m. Read the paper for your five-minute ride to the Union.

You'll arrive at the Union front door at 9:05 a.m. From there you can walk to Calvin, Seaton or Kedzie halls, and East Stadium in under two minutes. A five minute walk will put you at Willard, Cardwell halls, Hale Library or the engineering complex.

At the latest, you'll be at your destination by 9:10 a.m., a mere 15 minutes after you entered the purple parking paradise. Those who choose to idle in the lots waiting for a spot will still be waiting, battling the sharks in the trenches between each row. Idling hurts your car. It's like doing wall sits in gym class. Don't torture your car.

At 4 p.m., wander back to the Union and hang out. You'll be there until 4:23 p.m., when you will promptly be delivered back to your car. As you drive from the Foundation lot around 4:30 p.m., your car will grin from headlight to headlight. Knowing all the other oppressed cars idled in pain. You whistle a happy tune as you drive from the oasis.

K-State's success will ensure that enrollment remains at current levels or increase slightly in the years to come. Each year the parking situation will be more stressful. Pressure will mount until K-State implements a full-scale transportation system. A comprehensive system will depressurize parking stress.

Luckily, we have the purple parking paradise to relieve some of the pressure for now.

Take advantage of this opportunity. No doubt you will benefit personally. You'll have lower stress levels, more free time and the ability to say you've done your part to help the parking crunch. Utilizing the program will improve K-State and that is what this new purple parking paradise is all about.

Fair-weather fans should stand behind football team

I have this horrible skeleton in my closet. I have two cousins who attend the University of Nebraska and one who recently graduated.

I don't like to admit that I like people who go to Nebraska, much less that I'm related to them.

At our family gatherings around the holidays, the subject of football always comes up. It always used to go something like this...

Nebraska Cousin: "So, Sarah, how 'bout that football team? Still can't beat the good ol' Cornhuskers, can they?"

Then a wonderful thing happened. The year before I came to K-State, the football team finally beat Nebraska. When I visited campus the week after the big win, I stopped by Kedzie Hall to pick up a few copies of the paper printed after the victory.

I still remember that paper. The front page was a giant photo of a football player with his arms stretched out above his head. It was great. That Christmas, I gave extra copies of the paper to my cousins. I wanted to make sure they would always remember the day hell froze over.

My cousins laughed it off and said the win was a fluke and there was no way the Cats could repeat the win on Cornhusker territory next year.

I hated to admit it, but they were right. That Christmas, I had to deal with all of the teasing and unfunny jokes. You only refer to the Wildcats as the Mildcats so many times before someone gets hurt.

Then, once again, a miracle happened. We beat Nebraska. Two times in three years. Everyone thought it was impossible, but it happened. I remember rushing the field with another cousin who is a fellow K-Stater. I stood out in the snow until the goalpost came down. It was a day I'll never forget.

The Wildcat Christmas reigned once again. It was great. I let my whole family know how great K-State football was. By the end of the holiday, my Cornhusker cousins were ready for me to return to Wildcat country. Like the Nebraska football team, they couldn't take what the Wildcats dished out.

I am dreading this Christmas.

Inevitably the talk around the dinner table will turn to football. Statistics will be cited, insults will be tossed about and pride will be injured.

The 'Cats are not doing incredibly well this year, and my cousins will be sure to rub it in.

I will try my hardest to keep my chin up. I will say phrases such as, "This was a rebuilding year," "We graduated a lot of seniors," "Our kicker just hasn't found his groove yet."

The one thing I will not say is, "The Wildcats suck."

I won't reduce myself to becoming a fair-weather fan.

I want to smack all of the fair weather fans upside the head when I hear them say K-State football is hopeless. If I have to read one more Fourum comment about how awful the football team is and how Manhattan High School could beat us in a scrimmage, I might lose it. The next time I hear a fair-weather fan talk poorly about the football team, I'm going to roll up the paper and smack them on the head.

To tell you the truth, I'm embarrassed by the way K-State fans have acted this season.

So what if we're having a bad season? It's just one year. It's not reason enough to give up all hope. It certainly is not a good reason to verbally abuse football players.

It's not a reason to demean their efforts.

There are a lot of factors that have made this season different than others. I am by no means an expert on football, but I would think that having a relatively young and inexperienced quarterback would make winning a little bit harder. A tougher schedule from the get-go probably has played into the Wildcats' performance this year, also.

Football is not hopeless at K-State. Things will get better. Although we're in a bit of a slump, this is not the time to bad-mouth our team. We should stand behind the players and offer them our support. We should not be fair-weather fans.

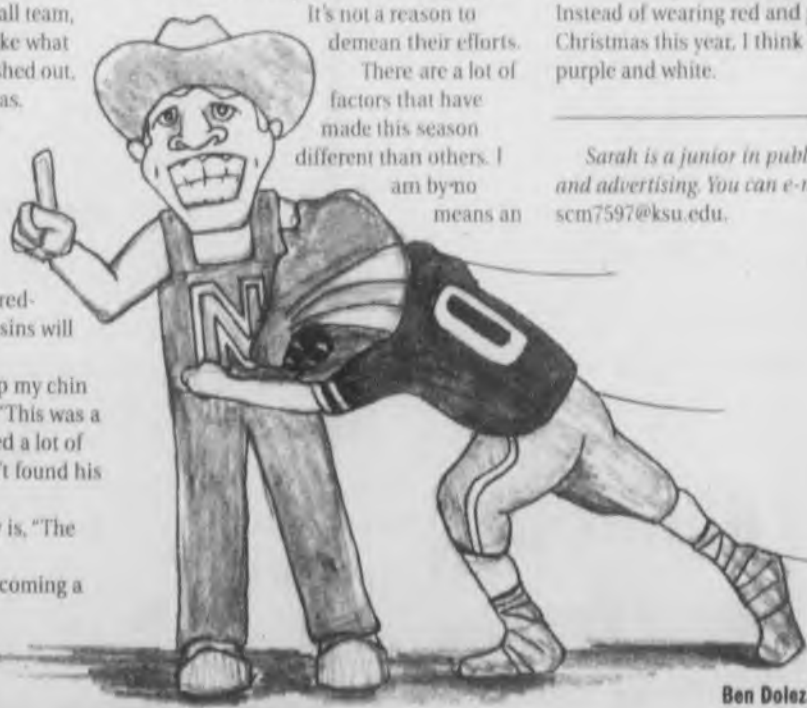

I already know Christmas this year likely will be Year of the Cornhusker at my family gathering, but that won't stop me from showing off my purple pride. Instead of wearing red and green for Christmas this year, I think I'll sport purple and white.

Volunteers help with Halloween fun

BY OLENA NIKOLAYENKO
Kansas State Collegian

Autumn can be the season for cool weather, midterms and final class projects, but it also can be the time to get involved in the community.

K-State students have volunteered throughout the week for Community Service Week.

On Wednesday, three K-State students volunteered to help Manhattan Housing Authority host a Halloween party at Flint Hills Place.

"I thought it would be fun to hang out with kids," said Amy Shearer, sophomore in life sciences. Marlene Campbell, residence service coordinator for Manhattan Housing Authority, said they offered kids from low-income families a chance to have a Halloween party.

"Given the situation in the country, a lot of parents do not let their kids go trick or treat," Campbell said. "So we decided to do it here — where they are safe and under supervision."

Matthew Diliberto, sophomore in horticulture, dressed up as a knight for the Halloween party.

"It was an accumulation of many nights," Diliberto said.

Before the children's arrival,

Kelly Glasscock/Collegian

Amy Shearer, sophomore in food and nutrition exercise science, and Erika Welch, junior in family studies and human services, laugh as children walk into the Halloween party at Flint Hills Place. The event was sponsored by Manhattan Housing Authority.

Shearer discussed the list of Halloween games with her friend, Erika Welch, sophomore in social work and family studies.

"We are going to play mummies and make them wrap up each other in toilet paper," Shearer said.

To create a spooky atmosphere in the storm shelter, a few volunteers decorated it with balloons and garlands. The "fog" emanating from the black curtain was the result of putting dry ice in hot water.

Six K-State students also helped Manhattan Main Street, a non-profit organization designed to revitalize downtown, prepare holiday decorations.

"Volunteers are helping us prepare for the Christmas season by checking light bulbs, picking up trash, pulling weeds and planting flowers," said Carrie Ohm, Manhattan Main Street executive director.

Surrounded with heaps of Christmas garlands, Jon Stutzman, freshman in open-option; Billy Altman, freshman in open-option; and Jill Szynskie, senior in public relations and Spanish, were unraveling the lights.

Stutzman and Altman said they signed up for the project because they are taking a University Experience course, which requires six hours of volunteer service.

Ohm said the volunteers were helpful.

"I contracted a person to do the job for $18 per hour, so the volunteers are saving us some money," Ohm said.

Other students assisted the Wonder Workshop Children's Museum in a haunted house fundraiser this week.

Overall, more than 350 K-State volunteers participated in the Community Service Week.

"This year, a lot of the projects focused on Halloween, which I think made students interested in volunteering," said Abby Hall, K-State Community Action for Leadership and Learning coordinator.

Hall said the Community Service Program received positive feedback from the Area Agency on Aging.

"Some volunteers had showed up at an elderly gentleman's home and helped him around his house and yard," Hall said. "He was very enthusiastic and appreciated the volunteers very much."

for servicing from a contaminated mail-processing center in Trenton, N.J.

Despite the discovery of contamination in four Food and Drug Administration mail centers in suburban Maryland one day, officials in the city said they believed the city was the worst of its own kind with bioterrorism. "We are in a different day," said Dr. Ivan Walks, the city's health director, as authorities said some of the thousands of residents taking antibiotics could stop their medication.

More than four weeks after the first anthrax diagnosis, the CDC said it had confirmed 16 cases in all. That included 10 of the inhalation type — including four deaths — and six of the less dangerous skin variety.

have confirmed three additional cases of skin anthrax, using a looser standard than the one used by federal authorities.

The latest to die was Nguyen, a 61-year-old hospital worker in New York City whose death has particularly troubled investigators because they can't establish how she contracted her disease.

"We have yet to detect the clues that would identify the source of her infection," said Dr. Julie Gerberding, deputy CDC director. In particular, she said there are "no clues to suggest that mail or the mail handling was the cause of her exposure."

Tests on Nguyen's apartment in the Bronx as well as the Manhattan Eye Ear and Throat Hospital where she worked have thus far discovered no contamination. An initial positive finding from a bag of the clothing she was wearing when she arrived at the hospital has since been shown to be negative, said New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani.

K-State forward Quentin Buchanan goes up to block a shot by Global Sports' Ramel Lloyd during the first half of the Cats' 58-57 loss on Thursday night at Bramlage Coliseum. The exhibition game was K-State's first of the season.

KSU drops close exhibition to Global Sports

BY SEAN PURCELL

Kansas State Collegian

With 1:29 remaining in the game and K-State leading 56-51, it seemed the Cats were headed for a win.

But a recurring nightmare surfaced again, as K-State fell on a last second shot by Global Sports guard Darren McClinton.

The nightmare began last year when the Wildcats lost a nail-biter to Oklahoma at home. K-State followed that up with four more heartbreaking losses by five points or less on the season.

After the game, talk of eliminating late game breakdowns was frequent among the Wildcats.

"This would be a dagger in our hearts if it was a regular season game," senior point guard Larry Reid said.

K-State dug its own grave in the end, mainly due to those missed free throws.

"This may be a good foul," McClinton said as junior forward

Matt Siebrandt missed his first of two free throws with a minute left and the Cats leading by three.

McClinton summarized the Wildcats' night at the charity stripe with those words. After knocking down both of its free throw attempts in the first half, K-State faltered in the second, shooting just three of 14 from the line. Easy points like those make the loss difficult to swallow, senior forward Travis Reynolds said.

"We need to make the free throws when they count," Reynolds said. "If we do that, it is a whole different ball game."

Despite the letdown, the players were relieved the contest was merely an exhibition. Junior Pervis Pasco said the game will serve as a learning tool of what not to do in future contests.

"Nobody wants to take the loss early in the season, whether it is exhibition or not," Pasco said. "But we all learn from this and move on."

Cats lose to All-Stars in game's final play

BY DEREK BOSS

Kansas State Collegian

K-State might have had more than 6,000 fans in Bramlage Coliseum at Thursday night's exhibition game, but it felt empty as the game clock expired.

There was nothing but silence. At least eight seconds after Darren McClinton's game-winning three-pointer swished through the basket, the Wildcat crowd remained stifled as the Global Sports All-Stars overcame a seven-point deficit in the final two minutes to down K-State, 58-57.

"I told our players, 'No one likes to lose. If you accept losing, you need to get out of this business,'" head coach Jim Wooldridge said. "But thank goodness it's an exhibition game, where it doesn't go on that record."

The Cats led by two after Larry Reid hit one of two free throws with 18 seconds remaining, but Global Sports wasn't finished.

Richard Mandeville missed an outside jumper that would have tied the game, but the ball found the hands of Kevin Rice, who dishd to an open McClinton in the corner to sink the last-second trey.

Wooldridge said it's important for K-State to avoid those kind of situations, where the last seconds determine the outcome of a ball game.

"There's got to be a sense of urgency now and improvement, because if it went in, in two weeks, it's going to stick a dagger right in your gut," Wooldridge said.

It was a see-saw battle throughout, with 15 lead changes and five ties in the game. The Cats biggest lead of nine came at the 6:37 mark of the first half, before Global Sports cut that deficit to one, 27-26, at the break.

Wooldridge said poor shot selection precluded his squad from breaking open a big lead in the first half. K-State shot 36 percent from the floor for the period, and just 38 percent for the game.

"We had a grass fire going on out there," Wooldridge said. "One guy would shoot it, then the next guy would shoot it — without any sense of teamwork or sense of offensive system or format."

Volleyball playing to sweep ISU

BY SAN PURCELL

Kansas State Collegian

K-State is looking to sweep another conference opponent this weekend when Iowa State comes to Ahearn Field House on Saturday night.

Sweeping the Cyclones has been somewhat of a habit for the Wildcats in recent years, a K-State's 10-0 record over Iowa State during the past five seasons is proof.

Next action

K-State (13-7, 9-5) vs. Iowa St. (4-15, 1-13)
When: Saturday, 7 p.m.
Where: Ahearn Field House
TV: none
Radio: KMAN 1350 AM

In fact, the Wildcats (13-7, 9-5) have dropped only one game to the Cyclones (4-15, 1-13) since the inception of the Big 12 in 1996.

That streak aside senior outside hitter Lisa Mimick said the Wildcats will have to maintain the same focus and determination this weekend to extend their dominance over the Cyclones.

"It is important that we go out there and play our style of volleyball," Mimick said. "If we do that, hopefully, we can crush them."

Crushing them is something the Cats didn't do in a four-set victory over the Cyclones in early October. K-State was met with resistance Oct. 10 in Ames, Iowa, struggling on the road against a Cyclone team determined not to let the Wildcats roll in three in their house.

Iowa State now will have to make the journey to Ahearn, where K-State has proven there is a very real advantage to playing at home. The Wildcats have dropped just one match at home this season — a three-set heartbreaker to national power Nebraska.

K-State has only three more chances to better themselves by playing in front of the Wildcat faithful, and head coach Szcie Fritz said through those opportunities her team will look to gain some momentum.

"We only have a few more opportunities left to play at home," Fritz said. "So we have to make the most of them."

Iowa State has been deemed the whipping child of the Big 12 in years past, posting only one win in conference play in the last two seasons.

But the Cats aren't about to look past the Cyclones, sophomore outside hitter Carl Jensen said. With the Big 12 ranking among the toughest conferences in the nation to play, K-State can't go in thinking the match will be a cakewalk.

"We can't overlook any team in this conference," Jensen said. "We just need to keep moving and keep playing well."

Wildcats must curtail Cyclones' offensive weapons to win game

I don't have a very good feeling about this weekend. Now, now — I don't expect head coach Bill Snyder to clip out this column and rush to his assistants like he's discovered the Holy Grail. I'm just a college kid throwing in my two cents.

And I'm sure as heck not always right (as my record in staff picks this year will attest). My predictions for K-State have even been so far off this year that they would've missed the broadside of OU offensive coordinator Mark Mangino's tail.

That's bad — real bad.

But I just didn't foresee that four-game losing streak this season. Looking back, I can pinpoint the causes — inexperience, the lack of a dominant No. 1 quarterback and a miserable display of special teams (NOTE: applications for placekicker can be picked up at the Vanier Sports Complex just north of the stadium).

There's your season in a nutshell.

Although a victory this weekend could keep the Cats from sitting on their butts come December — which should get the team pumped — I stop rambling and get to my point.

I just don't have a good feeling about this weekend. The problem is, K-State has two good-sized obstacles in its way of an Iowa State win — and their names are Seneca Wallace and Ennis Haywood.

Now, I'm not as worried about Haywood. He might be the leading rusher in the Big 12, averaging over 120 yards per game, but we've stopped big backs before — holding Texas' Ricky Williams to under 50 yards two seasons ago.

So we're OK there — it's Wallace that worries me. First off, Wallace is no Sage Rosenfels, the guy who was supposed to lead the Clones to an upset over K-State last season. ISU lost 56-10, and Rosenfels left the game so bruised up that his grill looked more messed up than Sebastian Janikowski.

Wallace is a proven passer, lighting up Texas A&M last week for 348 yards on 30 of 46 attempts while also averaging over 50 yards on the ground per game this year.

Derek Boss

The bottom line — if we contain Wallace, we win. But that margin of victory rests on a few other things, which might seem a bit basic.

• K-State's passing — Iowa State has the top-ranked pass defense in the conference, giving up just 152 yards a game through the air. Whether it's Marc Dunn or Eli Roberson on the field, they'll need to hit their receivers to open up Josh Scobey's running game.

• Turnovers — While K-State is even in turnover margin, the Cyclones are No. 1 in the league at +9. That could prove critical if the Cats give up easy points.

• Big plays — The Cats have been notorious for giving up the long ball — it literally cost them the game at Oklahoma. If they can limit that, they should be all right. In fact, K-State's defense has allowed the least amount of first downs this season in the conference (101), nine less than OU, who is second on the list.

So, there's my analysis, folks. Though I think the Cats have the advantage, I still don't have a good feeling about things (there's just something about Jack Trice Stadium and its god-awful, heckling, rude, inconsiderate and ungracious fans — the ones who threw a full beer can at me in the parking lot two years ago after our comeback win).

But it's payback time, Clones. It might be close, but K-State will prevail.

You ISU tailgaters are lucky I won't be making the trip.

K-State trying for bowl eligibility

BY SEAN PURCELL

Kansas State Collegian

A storm has formed over the city of Ames, Iowa, in recent years.

Each opponent who has entered the home of Iowa State has left knowing how tough the Cyclones play at Jack Trice Stadium.

"I don't know what it is about that place," senior linebacker Ben Leber said. "It must be something they put in the water."

K-State has a storm of their own after a convincing win over Kansas last weekend, and one thing's for sure — one storm will dissipate into nothingness this weekend as the two teams meet with the hopes of thundering through the rest of conference play.

"Each ball game becomes pivotal now," head coach Bill Snyder said. "They are even more important if we want to achieve our goals."

K-State quarterback Marc Dunn tries to escape Kansas defensive lineman Nate Dwyer during the Wildcats win over the Jayhawks last weekend. Jeanel Drake/Collegian

Those goals have been whittled down to one common denominator late in the 2001 campaign: a bowl invitation.

Before last week's dismantling of the Jayhawks, K-State's chance at postseason play looked dismal at best. But with the win, there might be daylight at the end of the tunnel, Snyder said.

"We got our feet back on the ground with that win," Snyder said. "It is a foundation to start from and it is the first step in getting back to where we want to be."

Unique wedding cake important part of ceremony

BY JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

Looking for good taste in wedding planning can be difficult.

But, Janice Hill, owner of Custom Designed Wedding Cakes, specializes in finding the perfect addition to the day's more appetizing qualities.

"A wedding cake adds to the ceremony," Hill said. "It is the extra little detail that brings the wedding together."

Hill, who has been decorating cakes for more than 25 years, said she watches her customers' reactions to help specialize a cake for them.

"I like to watch the couple look through the portfolio," she said. "They stop six times on fresh flower cakes. I know they are leaning towards that. It gives me an idea of their likes and dislikes."

Hill said the uniqueness of each cake is important to the brides.

"They want it to be special," she said.

"That is where my job comes in. We fit the pieces of the wedding together until we have a complete puzzle. The cake is just a part of a bigger picture."

The colors of the wedding usually are repeated in the cake design, Hill said.

"The color of the bride's dress is often duplicated in the frosting," she said. "Little details are important." Other accents and hues are repeated through flowers, trim and accessories, said Jami Lee, head cake decorator for Dillons Store No. 15.

"The colors of the wedding party are often popular for roses," Lee said.

"They typically will find a cake they like and then change the colors to match their bridal party."

Accessories such as fresh flowers also have been popular choices among brides, Ester Umscheid, a home cake decorator, said.

"It is a new trend I have been seeing in among the cakes," she said.

"It really makes for a beautiful design." Another difference Umscheid has noticed is the difference in flavors.

"It is not your traditional white cake anymore," she said.

"They are becoming more unique."

Many cake decorators agree it is better to come prepared when picking out the wedding cake.

"It makes the process smoother," Hill said.

"Then, we can spend more time on details."

Knowing how many guests, place of reception, date and time of wedding and colors are important factors in ordering a cake.

Umscheid said.

"It is a fun process," she said. "It adds so much to the wedding."

Agricultural engineering group to honor K-State

BY TYNA DEINES

Kansas State Collegian

K-State will be recognized by the American Society of Agricultural Engineers as a national historic site for grain aeration today.

The university was chosen by the society as a landmark in the application of aeration technology.

Joe Harner, professor of biological and agricultural engineering, described the process as a non-chemical way of storing and preserving grain.

"This presents some unique challenges since wheat harvest occurs during the summer when conditions are optimum for insect and mold growth," Harner said. "Generally, weather conditions are not as favorable for insect and mold growth when corn and soybeans are harvested during the fall."

The process consists of moving air through the grain to prevent a stagnation of carbon dioxide and heat. This, in turn, cuts down on mold and insects tied to moisture.

K-State was among the four original locations to apply this technology in 1930.

Jim Koelliker, head of the Department of Biological and Agricultural Engineering, said the award is an honor to the department of the past as well as present.

"We are proud that the organization is recognizing the efforts of our forebears. Kansas State has a long history of innovative research and technology development with grains, particularly wheat. This recognition of our agricultural engineers and grain scientists encourages us to continue their legacy."

Although he said this award gives an impetus to striving toward excellence, he also noted carrying on this legacy doesn't present any concern because of K-State's historic and continued innovations in grain technology.

Both Koelliker and Do Sup Chung, professor of biological and agricultural engineering, said the award did not come as a huge surprise.

"Kansas State is one of the places in the world people look to for grain technology, particularly wheat," Koelliker said. "We're probably one of the most important places in the world related to grain preservation, utilization and processing."

In addition to recognizing the department, the American Society of Agricultural Engineers also has presented a plaque, which will be included as part of the ceremony. The plaque will be on display in Seaton hall near room 155.

Senate sends debated funding bill back to committee

BY ALYSON RALETZ

Kansas State Collegian

Debating over how much money to award campus programs with the Educational Opportunity Fund, Student Senators sent a bill back to a committee, upsetting some senators at Thursday's meeting.

The Board of Regents only allows senators to give the money to scholarships, need-based grants, student salaries participating in community service programs and on-campus student employee salaries.

Student Body Vice President Brandon Kauffman leads the Educational Opportunity Fund committee and introduced the legislation, which included the 27 allocation proposals, at the Student Senate meeting Oct. 25. The budget must be sent to the Kansas Board of Regents for approval in two weeks.

These on-campus programs requested $368,931 from the fund, but Senate only had $240,220 to allocate them.

"We had to cut $128,711 — that's a lot of money," Kauffman said. "We made some really tough decisions in the committee. I even called a fourth meeting to dot all the I's and cross the T's."

"We wanted to make sure everything was exactly where we wanted to be before we proposed it to Senate," Kauffman said.

He said he supported his committee's decisions and did not wish to make any changes to the bill.

Ben Harder, privilege fee committee chair, said senators already had enough time to voice concern and the bill should have to wait another week for final action.

"I am disappointed in all of you who voted to refer the bill back to committee," Harder said. "All of this hum-drum could have been avoided if you had just looked at the bill this past week."

Elizabeth Richardson, academic affairs and university relations committee chair, said senators had every right to question and disagree with what the committee proposed.

"I don't think we should be chided for proposing or going against the inertia of the god's word of the committee," Richardson said. "We are here to debate."

Earlier in the meeting, Arts and Sciences Sen. Vicki Conner asked Kauffman why some programs were funded fully while others had been completely cut out.

Kauffman said the committee wanted to fund most programs at the levels they have historically been supported to ensure their stability and success. The committee completely cut other programs that had not historically utilized all of their funds, he said.

"We didn't want to nickel and dime programs just so we could give some money to all of them," he said. "We followed the history of the programs that felt it most effective to give money to the programs that were using all of their money."

Harder said that when a program does not use all of the money it has been allocated, other programs suffer.

"Yes, any money that is not used goes into a reserve account,"

Harder said. "But when that happens, it does not mean that money gets redistributed to the other programs that year."

"The money that didn't get used is wasted. That money could have been allocated to programs that needed it."

Since the senators referred the bill, the Educational Opportunity Fund Committee will meet next week and could write a second draft. Kauffman said he would reserve a much larger meeting room to accommodate all of the senators who said they wanted to attend the meeting.

It will be an open meeting and Kauffman said he would make sure all of the 27 campus programs on the bill will be notified of the meeting. He will announce the time and location next week.

Tabbs - Johnson

Lucas Tabbs and Jada Johnson, senior in public relations, wish to announce their engagement.

Lucas is the son of Dale and Alana Tabbs of Colby, Kan., and Jada is the daughter of Mike and Lana Johnson of Colby, Kan.

The couple are planning an Aug. 3 wedding in Cancun, Mexico.

LIVELY EXPERIENCE

High-energy band Flickerstick to perform Saturday at Silverado

BY BECKY FISCHER
Kansas State Collegian

VH1 brought Flickerstick almost instantaneous throngs of fans. But the band is just about the music. "They love music and performing," Adriana Sierra, Flickerstick's tour manager, said. "They're not prepackaged crap. Just because they were on a TV show doesn't mean they're not serious about music."

Manhattan will have a chance to judge that for itself Saturday night when the Dallas-based Flickerstick plays at Silverado Saloon.

As exposure for the band came mainly through VH1, Sierra said she fears people will shape their opinion of Flickerstick solely on that.

"They're a tight rock band that people need to see live," she said. "I'd probably compare them to Fuel. Flickerstick writes some emotion-based lyrics, but the sound is still hardcore."

Flickerstick was one of four competitors on VH1's "Bands on the Run." Cameras followed four bands for eight weeks while they performed concerts. Highest sales of merchandise and tickets, along with guest judges, determined the winner, and Flickerstick won. The band since has signed with Epic, Sierra said.

"They'd made a record before signing, but it wasn't on a label," Sierra said. "Now, they've rerecorded it with Epic for release on Nov. 8. It has a few changes."

The album, "Welcoming Home the Astronauts," was remixed by Tom Lord-Alge (Weezer, Blink-182, Marilyn Manson). Flickerstick added a track, "Smile," for which they also made a music video.

KSDB-FM 91.9 plays two of Flickerstick's songs, "Beautiful" and "Coke," said Adam Mahmood, 91.9 DJ and senior in psychology.

"They're both good songs," Mahmood said. "I've listened to the album, and everything I've heard I've liked."

However, "Coke" and "Beautiful" do not represent the entire album, Sierra said.

"I really like both of those songs," she said, "but they're lighter than most of the album. People are usually surprised to hear them perform such a hard show."

The band seems to have a reputation for good live shows, Mahmood said.

"From what I've heard, they're great live," he said. "Flickerstick is one of the underrated bands out there. I remember seeing them on VH1, and they were my pick to win. They're a talented group."

Flickerstick's sound is unique, Mahmood said.

Flickerstick will play at Silverado Bar and Saloon Saturday. Doors open at 5 and tickets cost $8.

BirdHouse show to offer mix of rock, bluegrass

BY LAYTON EHMKE
Kansas State Collegian

BirdHouse Concert Series brings bluegrass revolutionist John Cowan to the Manhattan Arts Center Saturday night.

A handful of bluegrass musicians helped to put a spin on the traditional style within the past 10 years. The style they created is newgrass, Steve Martini, BirdHouse coordinator, said. One of these artists was John Cowan. Now he is on tour, and he is bringing a five-piece band to Manhattan.

Cowan has played with Garth

Brooks, Wynona Judd, Travis Tritt and many others. He has two solo albums and played with the Sky Kings until 1997. His career has been anything but limited.

Cowan plays bass for his band, but the most prevalent instrument in the group is Cowan's voice, Martini said.

"He is an unbelievable tenor. When Cowan gets wailing, it's crazy," he said.

Martini said the audience will remember his voice and the variety of music that the band plays. Newgrass is, for the most, part up-beat bluegrass mixed with rock, Martini said.

"Cowan and his band are tight and electric. It is high energy," he said.

David Kamerer, Birdhouse coordinator, said the 1970s led a whole generation toward bluegrass. Musicians took the strict rules of bluegrass set by Bill Monroe and added rock to them.

Cowan got his start playing bass for New Grass Revival with Sam Bush in Glasgow, Ky., at the age of 20. He later became the lead singer.

"Newgrass added a rock sensibility to bluegrass," Kamerer said. "Cowan's band plays with intensity and expert skill. These are good musicians."

"John Cowan has a beautiful and powerful voice. It was easy for us to say we wanted him to come to Manhattan when the opportunity came up. His voice is really something to behold."

The band is comprised of bass, drums, banjo, mandolin and mini-mandolin, all played by award winning musicians, Cowan said.

"We all work well with each other, it's a true band," he said. "The musicianship is very good, and very energetic."

Cowan said he was influenced by rock and pop music as a child, which accounts for the new fusion.

"I grew up singing in church, and at that time, black artists like Ray Charles and Stevie Wonder were becoming a part of pop culture," he said. "What we're doing is putting a modern spin on old-time instruments. It's indescribable."

"We love and respect traditional bluegrass music, but we do it our way. We are the punks of bluegrass. It's strange, but cool and different."

Cowan said doing something different from the traditional way is something which may not be appreciated instantly, but later will be appreciated. He said it is good to express oneself and have freedom even if it angers some people.

"Back in the day, bluegrass traditionalists hated what we were doing. But now, the gates have opened," he said.

Getting Cowan with a full band is a rare opportunity for the BirdHouse series, Kamerer said.

"This music stretches the boundaries, but it will be familiar," he said. "This is bluegrass-inspired music with the ferocity of a rock band."

laundry lowdown

Julia Bedingfield, sophomore in business, starts a dryer at Speedwash Laundry in Aggieville, where she frequently launders her clothes.

washing wisdom

■ Clothes don't need to dry longer than 40 minutes. Drying for a long time eventually wears out clothes.

■ It's a good idea to dry jeans for 10 or 15 minutes and then hang them up to avoid shrinkage.

■ If the lint vent isn't cleaned out often, clothes take longer to dry because air can't flow as well. Lint buildup can cause dryers to heat up by 10 or 15 degrees.

■ Always put detergent in before the clothes. This is the best way for detergent to dissolve and get into the clothes.

■ More than one capful of detergent can cause too many suds. Adding fabric softener knocks down the suds.

■ Polyester clothing can be put in the washer, but let the item drip dry. Basically, if a tag says drip-dry, it means drip-dry.

■ Don't forget to sort. Always wash whites with whites and colors with colors.

■ Greasy work clothes will come out clean if a can of Coca-Cola is poured into the washer.

All tips are from Richard Cummings, who has done maintenance work at Manhattan laundromats for 32 years.

Richard Cummings has done maintenance work for Manhattan laundromats for 32 years and has worked at Speedwash Laundry in Aggieville for 12 years. He said he enjoys his job and the experiences and the people. "I've met a lot of really nice people through my job," Cummings said.

Stories, rituals, time found at laundromats

Story by Nancy Hull

A heavy waterfall drenches clothes in a washer. A zipper lightly slaps the side of a dryer as jeans somersault around the machine.

On a typical night in Manhattan laundromats, the loudest noise comes from quarters racing down a change machine. Conversations are few and far between — aside from the occasional murmur of someone on a cell phone.

"Usually you go in, do your thing and get out," Kelli Muraca, junior in criminology, said about the lack of voices in laundromats.

She said she usually runs errands while her clothes are in machines. Sometimes she stays and studies.

"I've never really struck up a conversation with anyone," said Muraca.

Since she does laundry every week, she never carries more than two loads of laundry in her plastic basket.

But some people walk in with several overflowing cardboard boxes or stuffed trash bags.

Richard Cummings, who's done maintenance work at Manhattan laundromats for more than 30 years, has seen it all.

Once, he said, a woman came in with 13 loads of laundry.

"She had three or four wicker baskets full. I bet she blew 30 or 40 bucks," said Cummings, who's worked at Speedwash Laundry in Aggieville for 12 years. "Then, she came in another time and did the same thing again."

He's watched washers bubble over, seen someone mistake a washer for a dryer and caught intoxicated college students riding inside of the 160-degree dryers.

Through the years, he's seen lots of laundry blunders.

"Just this week, this young lady came in and had some pink negligees, and her socks turned pink," Cummings said. "It tickled me, but I didn't want to laugh out loud. If a person makes a mistake, you have to be courteous."

For the most part, people are courteous to one another, he said.

"If someone needs a dryer, people usually take their clothes out for them," Cummings said.

He said people can get hostile if they don't like

Brandon Holt, a Manhattan resident who does landscaping for the Department of Housing and Dining Services, reads to pass the time while he waits for his laundry to finish drying Tuesday. "I ran out of work clothes, so I had to drag my butt to the laundromat," Holt said.

people moving their clothes.

"But I say if you don't want people messing with your clothes, you better be on time to take care of them," he said.

Clothing theft is not something Cummings said he sees as a problem in Manhattan. When random belongings are left behind at the mat, he locks them in the lost-and-found.

If items aren't claimed within two weeks, they're given to Goodwill.

Brandon Holt, Manhattan resident, said he never worries about getting his clothes stolen from a laundromat, but he has lost things before.

"I've come up short on socks. But that happens all the time. I maybe have three or four pairs of socks that match," he said. "I have to buy new ones every three or four months."

Holt said his main concern is getting in and out of the mat quickly.

Cummings said people usually can get laundry done faster during the days, when it's the slowest. Tuesday evenings, he said, are the busiest. On most nights, things start to die down by 10.

When laundromats start to wind down at night, a dryer or two hums lowly, and dryer sheets that once weighed down the air with powder have floated to the ground.

And in the middle of the floor, there always seems to be a lonesome, white sock.

stain guide

Always read and follow the care instructions and any warnings on the garment label.

chocolate

Treat the stain with a prewash spray or pretreat with a product containing enzymes. Rub with heavy-duty liquid detergent. Launder. If stain remains, relaunder with bleach that is safe for the fabric.

lipstick

Place the stain face down on folded paper towels. Sponge area with dry-cleaning solvent. Replace towels frequently; let dry. Rub with heavy-duty liquid detergent and launder. Repeat treatment if needed using an all-fabric bleach because it is less damaging to colors and fabric.

lotion

Saturate light stains with a pretreatment spray stain remover and wait several minutes for it to penetrate. Rub with a heavy-duty liquid detergent. Launder. If color stain remains, launder with chlorine bleach if safe for fabric, or use an all-fabric bleach. Always test for colorfastness before using bleach. Place heavy stains face down on paper towels. Apply dry cleaning fluid to the back of stain. Replace towels frequently. Let air dry. Rinse. Launder in hottest water safe for fabric.

wine

Launder with detergent in hottest water safe for the fabric. Do not use soap (bar, flake, or detergent containing natural soap), since soap could make stain permanent or at least more difficult to remove. Soak tough stains for 30 minutes in 1 quart of warm water and 1 teaspoon of enzyme presoak product.

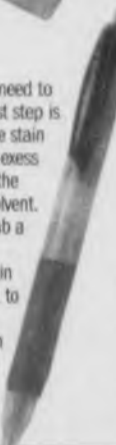

butter or oil

Treat light stains with a pretreatment spray stain remover and wait a couple minutes for it to penetrate. Rub with a heavy-duty liquid laundry detergent. Launder. If color stain remains, launder with chlorine bleach if safe for the fabric, or use an all-fabric bleach. Always test for colorfastness before using bleach. Place heavy stains face down on clean paper towels. Apply dry cleaning fluid to the back of stain. Replace towels frequently. Let air dry; rinse. Launder in hottest water safe for the fabric.

To have any chance, you need to treat immediately. The first step is to force water through the stain before it dries to remove excess ink. Allow to dry. Sponge the stain with dry cleaning solvent. Allow the fabric to dry. Rub a liquid detergent into the stain. Rinse. Soak the stain in warm water to which 1 to 4 tablespoons of household ammonia have been added. Rinse and repeat if stain is lessening. Launder.

Hold ice on the gum to harden it. Crack or scrape off what you can using the dull side of a butter knife. Spray with an aerosol pretreatment product, and let stand for five minutes. Rub with heavy-duty liquid detergent. Launder. Repeat if necessary.

Snyder even went as far as to compare the Cyclone signal-caller to Nebraska quarterback Eric Crouch and K-State great Michael Bishop, giving people the sense Wallace has become a prime-time quarterback in K-State's offense also will have to prove themselves. The Cats will face one of the best defenses in the country. The Cyclones are hovering around the middle of the pack in terms of total defense, but Iowa State makes up for it with a stellar passing defense that ranks in the top five.

"It is always important to go out there and get off to a good start," Dunn said. "It is harder being on the road, but the goal is to keep your defense off the field as much as you can and hopefully we can do that."

"We are in a position to make every game count," Lockett said. "So it is important that we play well from here on out."

"It's tough when you're up five with a minute and a half or two minutes left and you lose the game, but it's an exhibition game and it's a learning process," Reynolds said. "I think the newcomers will learn what it's going to take to win games down the stretch."

City residents explore history

BY KECIA N. SEYB
Kansas State Collegian

People who have lived in Manhattan all their lives might be surprised to discover that an abundance of Civil War Underground Railroad history lives in the Manhattan area. Seven people spent their Sunday afternoon learning all about this history.

Four American Ethnic Studies Student Association members, one boyfriend, one husband and one mother of the members joined Richard Pitts, director of Wonder Workshop Children's Museum and a top authority on regional Underground Railroad history, to learn about several historical sites in the Manhattan area.

"It's a very, very important part of our history," Pitts said. "It was the first time that the people got together in this country to fight a monster. That monster was slavery."

The group met at the children's museum and traveled together in a van, stopping first at the Beecher Bible and Rifle Church in Wabauunsee, Kan., which was built between 1859 and 1862.

Arriving at the church, Nikki Adams, vice president of AESSA, said she was excited for the rest of the day.

"It isn't even started, but I want to do it again," she said.

The church's purpose was to provide a way for abolitionists who needed rifles to obtain them. Suppliers would send rifles with a top layer of Bibles in a box. No slaves were hidden in this particular building, though, Pitts said.

Churches were vital in communicating and serving as safe places to keep the slaves free from slavery, Pitts said.

Inside the Wabauunsee church, the group members looked around and sat in the pews while Pitts spoke from the pulpit about the importance of the Civil War's Underground Railroad and how important it was for him to know his African-American history.

"I had no idea what kind of contributions Africans — my ancestors — made to the world," Pitts said. "My thought was that my history began with slavery."

He said that if all people traced their ancestry, they would find that their ancestors also were slaves. He said people need to know their ancestors were more than just property or just treated as cattle.

"If you know that you came from people of great things, don't you want to aspire to great things?" he said. "No one's history starts in slavery. You have to know you came from a community of great things. Black people's history didn't start with slavery."

More forces deployed to Afghanistan

BY JOHN J. LUMPKIN
Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — More U.S. special forces entered Afghanistan to support anti-Taliban rebels as top commanders said Sunday the Taliban government is weakening but still controls substantial troops that will take time to thin out and conquer.

"We're setting in for the long haul," said Air Force Gen. Richard Myers, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

"We are going to continue to resupply" the anti-Taliban fighters of the opposition northern alliance right through the winter, Myers said. "We think that they have every chance of prevailing."

The general said a couple more teams of special forces were inserted in Afghanistan the last few days. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said last week he hoped to at least triple the number of special forces inside Afghanistan, now believed to number between 100 and 200.

The teams are working with opposition leaders and "the more teams we get on the ground, the more effectively we'll bring air power to bear on the Taliban lines," Myers said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

The teams are likely to include Green Berets, U.S. Army commandos who specialize in advising foreign troops. Special forces on the ground also can find hidden targets for U.S. airstrikes.

The Pentagon said Sunday that U.S. bombing over the weekend focused on targets close to four key cities near the Taliban front lines with northern alliance rebels: Bagram, Taloqan, Konduz, and Mazar-e-Sharif.

The northern alliance claims to have launched a major offensive near Mazar-e-Sharif. Capture of that city by anti-Taliban forces would open a main supply route from Uzbekistan and Tajikistan.

U.S. bombs also targeted caves and tunnels suspected as Taliban and al-Qaeda hideouts.

In Pakistan, Rumsfeld said four weeks of U.S. bombing have weakened the Taliban's ability to operate as a government.

The Taliban are using their power in enclaves throughout the country to impose their will on the Afghan people, but are not making major military moves, Rumsfeld said. "The Taliban (are) not really functioning as a government."

Myers said the United States has taken down Taliban air defenses, their transportation for resupplying their troops and their communications.

"They have a substantial force left, but at this point that's exactly what we expected," Myers said.

Myers and Army Gen. Tommy Franks, commander of U.S. forces in the war, declined to say whether it would take a large deployment of U.S. ground troops to topple the Taliban.

Sex in a bottle?

Niagara, a new caffeine drink, is designed to inspire some women to feel more sexy. It has been called the 'Viagra for women.'

Aphrodisiac energy drink makes way to Aggieville bars

BY SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

An aphrodisiac energy drink that got its roots in Sweden has made its way into Aggieville. Niagara, a fizzy blue dietary supplement that has been dubbed "Romance in a bottle" and "Viagra for Women" has been distributed to four local bars: Gilligan's, Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon, Porter's and Longhorn's.

Brett Heff, senior in architectural engineering, is the Manhattan distributor of Niagara. After trying the berry-flavored drink, Heff said he felt more relaxed.

"It makes you feel happy," he said. "It makes you want to smile. You feel good about yourself."

The drink, which is supposed to jumpstart the female libido, first came to the United States in 1993 when Lori Williams, of Little Rock, Ark., tried it.

"My body went, 'Oh my gosh.' (My husband Roger) started kissing me, and I thought, 'Oh my gosh, this stuff really works,'" Williams said her first time drinking Niagara.

Williams talked with Niagara's creator, Nordic Drinks in Stockholm, Sweden, and decided to distribute the potion in the United States. She began selling it at her café, Wycoff Coffee House, and then distributing it to other stores.

Williams reportedly sells millions of bottles each year.

Wade Phillips, owner of Gilligan's, decided to also sell Niagara.

"It's something new and funny," he said.

"The response has been people really like it. As far as the results — I couldn't tell you about that," Phillips laughed.

Phillips, who has a background in nutrition, said he estimates that the drink could cause a 10 to 15 percent increase in libido. He said it was mostly just an energy drink.

"I kind of felt funny," Phillips said about trying Niagara. "A little energized."

The bars will mix the bottle of Niagara with a shot of vodka. Most will be charge around $7 for the drink. Charlie Ventz, bartender at Chance, said that so far, sales have been minimal.

"The costs to us are so high that we have to Journalist lectures on U.S. leaders

America does not know what the future holds for the country, but America can try to understand what it already knows about Sept. 11, a speaker said Friday.

David Gergen, editor-at-large of U.S. News and World Report, presented the 123rd Landon Lecture on Friday.

Gergen addressed three main issues that have helped Americans understand their country and its leadership after the tragedy of Sept. 11. Gergen spoke of the U.S. presidency and the U.S. power in a time of tragedy.

Since Sept. 11, Gergen said he feels as if Americans have snapped back from being individualistic to the traditional American character.

"We exercise our freedom by free association. We come to each other's aid in a time of crisis," he said.

Gergen used New York City was used as an example to illustrate his point about people joining forces to help others.

Athletic department's reading program visits local grade school

BY JESSICA PITTS

Monsters, apples and mice filled Theodore Roosevelt Elementary School's kindergarten room Friday morning.

"The monsters were all over," Sierra Schon, kindergartner, said. "I liked the book about them the best."

The students, grades kindergarten through 6th, joined the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics' Reading "Til They're Purple," as part of Kevin Lockett's Read and Achieve Foundation.

Athletes and coaches participated by sharing their favorite books with a class. Kari Hanson, women's basketball player, shared "Where the Wild Things Are" by Maurice Sendak.

"I liked her reading the book," Lukas Hugunin, kindergartner, said. "The monster one was fun."

Hanson volunteered because of the chance to promote reading. "Hopefully, if the kids see we are having fun reading, they will pick up the book after we leave and have fun reading by themselves," she said.

The program, a spinoff of the Read and Achieve Program in the evenings, was designed to take reading one step further.

"The athletes volunteer to read individually to the students in the evenings," said Michelle Stribling, assistant academic counselor for student athletes.

"We wanted to be able to bring more students together at one time along with more coaches, athletes and cheerleaders and really celebrate reading. This event is a starting point."

Mary Stamey, principal of Roosevelt and Eugene Field Elementary, said she hopes to make the event an annual celebration.

"It has been a lot of fun," Stamey said.

"The kids are able to look up to their heroes and see them reading and enjoying it. It sends a great message."

Tim Norris, men's golf coach, shared a book about Jackie Robinson to a third-grade class.

"I want to give them something they can identify with," Norris said.

"If sports and athletes reading to them attracts their interest to a book, then great. We want them to follow our lead and continue reading."

Sierra Schon, kindergartner, tries to look at a card held by Karl Hanson, K-State women's basketball player, during a reading game for "Reading 'Til They're Purple," as part of Kevin Lockett's Read and Achieve Foundation on Friday morning at Theodore Roosevelt Elementary.

Anthrax scare reaches New York mayor's office, Veterans Affairs' hospital

BY PAUL RECER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Traces of anthrax were reported Sunday on a package sent from NBC to the New York mayor's office and at a Veterans Affairs' hospital in Washington, D.C.

Health investigators were stymied in efforts to find the source of anthrax that killed a New York woman, but experts said they were relieved that no new cases linked to her unique exposure have surfaced.

On Capitol Hill, workers prepared to sterilize the anthrax-contaminated Hart Senate office building with chlorine dioxide gas, but the Longworth House office building was reopening Monday morning for the first time since Oct. 17.

Capitol Police Lt. Dan Nichols said late Sunday all portions of the building will be open except for three sealed off rooms where anthrax has been found.

Reopening of the Longworth leaves only the Hart building closed among major Capitol Hill facilities.

A small building housing congressional support personnel also remains closed.

AMERICA RESPONDS

Officials at the Mayo Clinic were to announce

Monday a new DNA test that can give a quick answer about any possible anthrax sample.

At the Centers of Disease Control and Prevention, 140 health care workers have been vaccinated against smallpox, a precaution that will protect medical workers who would be the first to respond to any outbreak of the highly contagious disease.

Mayor Rudolph Giuliani of New York said there's no reason to be concerned about traces of anthrax found on a package containing a videotape sent to his office from the office of NBC anchor Tom Brokaw. The tape contained footage of a White House briefing Sept. 18 in which a Giuliani aide was mentioned.

The mayor said there was no evidence that anyone at City Hall was infected from the package, handled by four or five people.

Technicians conducted environmental tests at City Hall on Sunday.

City health officials said the tape was associated with an anthrax-laced letter sent to NBC on Sept. 18 from Trenton, N.J.

The tape was sent to a lab for tests Oct. 23; the results came back Saturday.

"We feel pretty confident that it was cross-contaminated," city Health Department spokeswoman Sandra Mullin, said.

"This not a new contamination."

Trace amounts of anthrax also were found in the mail room of the Veterans Affairs Medical center, based on tests completed Saturday by the CDC.

Veterans Affairs spokesman Phil Budahn said five mail room employees have been on antibiotics since Oct. 25 as a precaution. He said the hospital's 250 patients would be monitored, but it was thought unlikely that anthrax could have spread beyond the mail room, which closed Wednesday for cleaning.

The medical center received mail from Brentwood, a Washington, D.C. postal center that processed an anthrax-laced envelope delivered to Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle's office. A number of other Washington, D.C. area mailrooms that receive mail from Brentwood have showed traces of contamination, all believed to have come from the Brentwood facility.

Dr. Anthony S. Fauci, director of the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases, said Sunday that the source of the spores that caused the death last week by inhalation anthrax of Kathy T. Nguyen in New York was unknown.

Nguyen died a short time after being admitted to a hospital. She was not able to be interviewed and investigators have not been able to link her infection to the postal service or to mail handling.

Early anthrax tests at her Bronx apartment and at the hospital where she worked were negative. CDC investigators are widening the effort to include other places where she might have contracted the spores.

"Every possible lead is being followed," said Dr. Jeffrey Koplan, head of the CDC.

He said the investigation has been difficult because Nguyen lived alone.

Fauci said the lack of a known postal connection suggests that Nguyen might have gotten the disease in a different way.

He said it is possible that hers is a sentinel case in a new and evolving pattern.

If that were true, there should have been similar cases by now, Fauci said on CBS' "Face the Nation."

Investigators are checking her contacts to find if there are other cases, but none have been found.

"That's the good news," he said. "The bad news is that we still have a mystery of how this happened."

Workers prepared to sterilize the Hart building, where anthrax hot spots were found on four floors after a letter was opened in Daschle's office.

Officials announced last week a proposal to fumigate the nine-story building with chlorine dioxide gas.

The gas would kill any lingering anthrax spores — along with rats, mice and cockroaches — without harming papers, files and art work.

While the vaccination of the CDC moves ahead, there are no plans to inoculate all Americans, the CDC's head, Dr. Jeffrey Koplan, said.

Federal health officials have said that four drug companies are studying ways to manufacture new smallpox vaccine and build up the nation's stockpile to about 300 million, enough for every American.

Since the anthrax crisis began last month, 10 Americans have developed inhaled anthrax, the most serious form of the disease; Nguyen was the fourth to die.

More money

New tuition-ownership plan to increase amount students pay

Students will see their tuition increase next year. We don't know how much the increase will be or what colleges will be under the new tuition-ownership plan.

It's no longer a flat, per-credit-hour type.

It takes money to run this university — lots and lots of it — but we need more.

One of the most important sources of funding is student tuition.

The university receives more than $50 million from students, President Jon Wefald said in his State of the University address.

The Kansas Board of Regents has allowed K-State to own money received from student tuition. This allows the university to charge, collect and spend it without going through the regents.

In turn, K-State also has the authority to structure the tuition rates on its own.

The university is trying to decide how to do this now. Student input will be a large factor when the administration makes its decisions.

This is students' money and education — it is vital to tell the administration what you think.

Here are some aspects of the tuition structure that already have changed, K-State Student Body President Kyle Barker said:

1. Tuition will be approved by the regents four months prior to the academic year. Previously, rate increases were approved 15 months prior to the academic year.

2. K-State will be able to spend all of its tuition revenue without further approval. In the past, the legislature placed expenditure limits on tuition revenue.

3. Tuition revenue estimates will not be included when K-State requests funding from the state. This means the university will request money, but if there was an increase in enrollment — thereby tuition revenue — K-State would keep a lot more money than before the tuition-ownership plan.

4. In five years, all changes will be reviewed to see how effective the measures have been.

Barker said the administration is looking at several options to change the tuition structure under the plan. Some of these choices include:

1. Increasing tuition to put us among the top 10 land-grant universities, which would mean a 25 percent increase for the next five years.

2. Splitting tuition between lower-level classes, 300-level and below, and upper-level classes, above the 300 level.

3. Splitting tuition between the colleges. For example, the College of Education could have one tuition structure, while the College of Engineering could have another funding level. Barker said it even could be split between departments. Using this option, different classes could be billed at different levels of funding.

4. Increasing tuition by 10 percent every year for the next five years.

5. Increasing tuition by 5 percent to compensate for inflation. This would keep us at the same level of funding under which K-State currently operates.

Regardless of the changes, it looks as if financial aid still will be a rock for students to depend on.

"We'd be run more like a business, more efficiently," Barker said. "I would imagine our financial aid structure would tend to shadow our tuition. We're here to serve the students of the state. We represent every county in Kansas. I know a lot of the kids need that financial aid assistance. We have to continue that."

Larry Moeder, director of Student Financial Assistance, said financial aid dollars tend to increase every year because Congress realizes that as costs increase, so should student aid funds.

"A delay in the approval of a tuition increase will not result in a delay in a student's financial-aid process," he said. "Currently, a student's eligibility for student aid is based, in part, on projected and average costs for the coming academic year."

"If, by chance, we happen to be way off in our March projection, we have the ability to go back into a student's file at a later date and make financial aid award adjustments."

No student looks forward to increases in tuition.

However, K-State might see the benefits from an increase in student money with the tuition-ownership system.

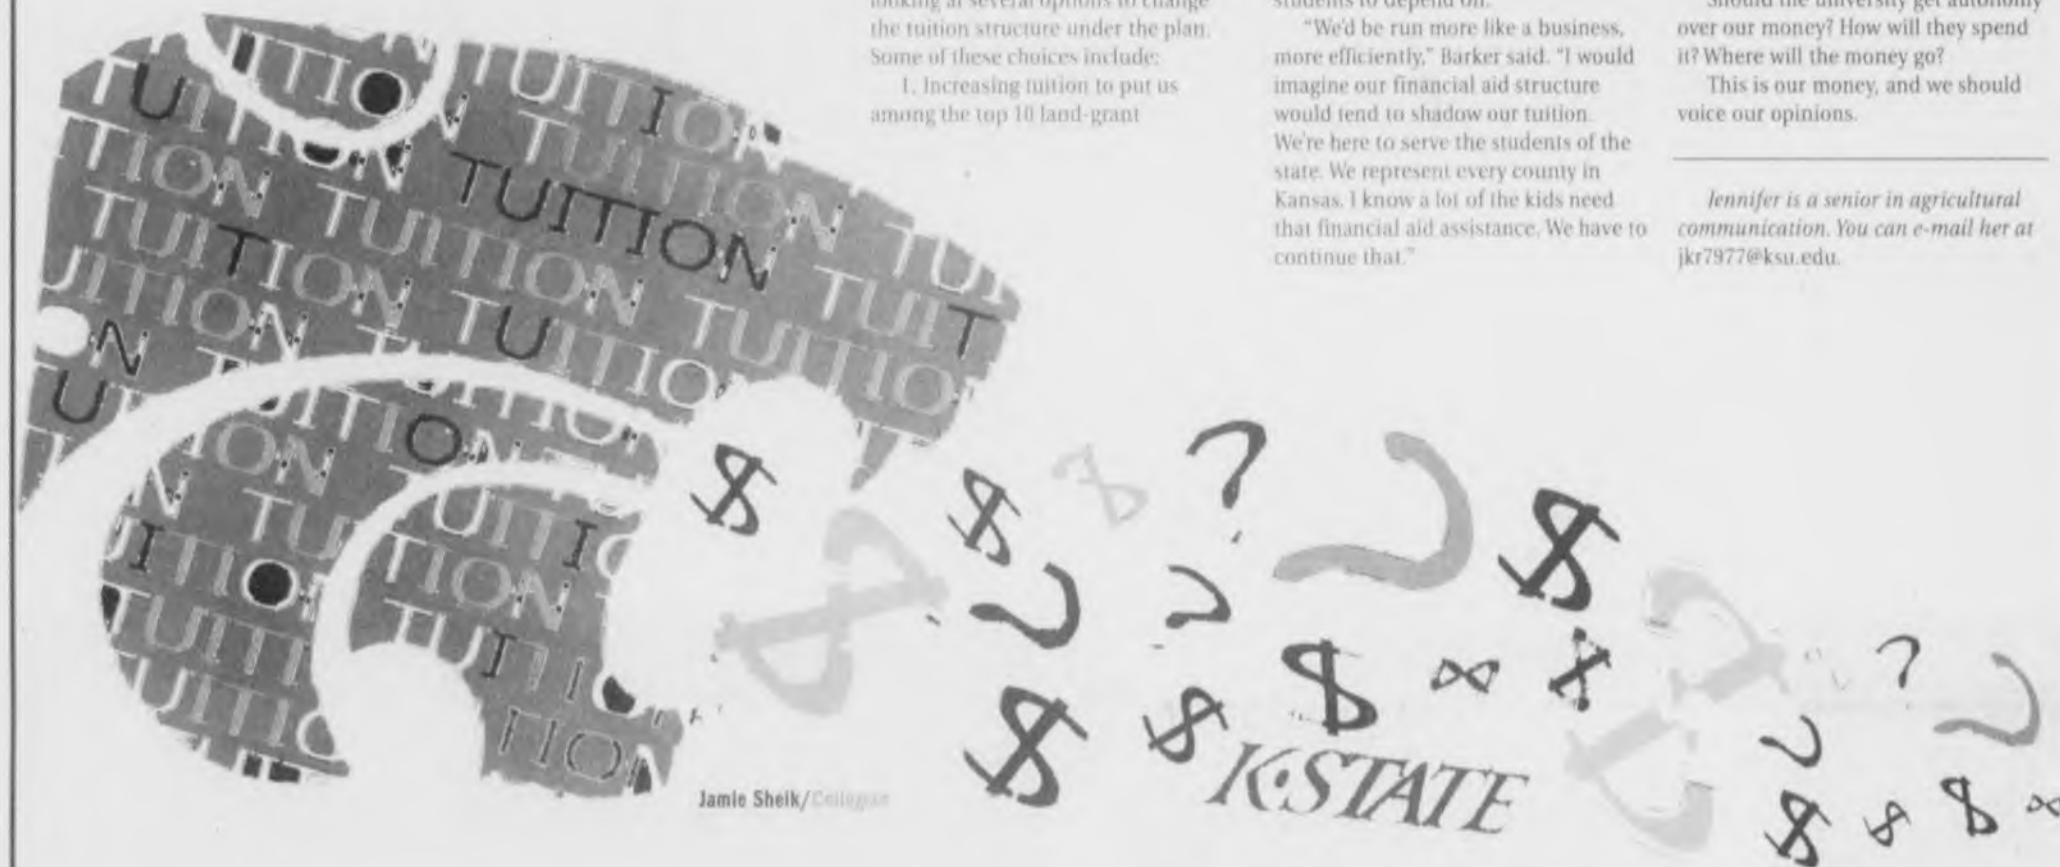

Should the university get autonomy over our money? How will they spend it? Where will the money go?

This is our money, and we should voice our opinions.

Role models help increase literacy rates

Making children excited about reading is important. With constant distractions of video games and cartoons, it can be hard to sit children down and show them the joys of reading.

High literacy rates are a key to any educated, democratic society. Last Friday, several K-State athletes and coaches took time out of their day to come together and read to children at Theodore Roosevelt Elementary School's kindergarten class.

Having local role models show children at a young and impressionable age that reading is cool is a very commendable action.

The Read and Achieve Foundation, set up by former K-State football player Kevin Lockett, is an excellent demonstration of giving back to a community. Setting up days such as "Reading 'Til They're Purple" promotes an even more visual way how important education is to children.

We tip our hats to all those athletes or other community members who take time and give back to Manhattan. Whether it be through reading or building houses, each community service act makes Manhattan a stronger, better place.

Overabundance of psychics trivializes use of prediction powers in solving crimes

Do you believe in psychics?

Anyone who has watched television after midnight has been bombarded with the mysticism of psychic powers. For a mere $4 a minute, you can have your future predicted and all of your worries dissolved.

It doesn't stop there. You can use a credit card and the Web, and for only $39.95 have a psychic reading on the Internet. While preparing this column, I looked on several fortune-telling Web sites. There were so many to choose from. I had a hard time deciding which to evoke for help.

Finally, I chose one of the few free sites titled the "Dead psychics" network. I entered my full name, birth date and double clicked on the question of my choice.

For curiosity's sake, I chose "Will (insert name here) ever marry me?" I entered the name of a friend and eagerly awaited the answer. Imagine my disappointment when the mystics from the underworld replied, "Of course not. He's a loser."

This was not the insight I had hoped to gain, but it confirmed my suspicion. The media is so oversaturated with psychics, fortune tellers and tarot readers, it is extremely difficult to believe in the powers of prediction and future-telling.

If you do not believe in psychic powers, you are not in the minority. Even those who scoff at the concept of the infomercial genre of psychic, (like Miss Cleo) might be interested to know another type of psychic does exist.

These psychics are called detective psychics, and they are employed by police departments all over the world to help solve crimes or offer tips and clues. Internet research suggests more than 70 percent of police departments employ help from psychics.

These psychics, although not 100 percent accurate, have aided in the recovery of many bodies and found missing children. British psychic Norma Reiner, one of the world's leading detective psychics, is renowned for her 85-percent accuracy in predictions and case solving.

It seems as if some are born with an innate gift to see or imagine things that other people cannot. Whether their visions come in dreams or as a product of deep meditation, this type of alternative investigation has been used for years and yields surprisingly positive results.

With the success and prevalence of this type of psychic, it is a wonder more people are not aware of their function in the legal society. This hush-hush attitude easily is explained by the cynicism of the public.

Many people simply do not believe in psychic powers. Even when psychics are evoked in order to help solve crimes, it is easier for people to believe the help and clues they offer are a mere coincidence. A feeling exists that the information revealed is too vague to be taken seriously or simply a matter of luck. Maybe these beliefs come from the fact that they are so oversold on TV.

Whatever your feeling on psychic powers, it is obvious to see aside from the late night, money-sucking variety, a different type of psychic does exist. These people use their innate gifts to do more than predict winning lottery numbers. They devote their lives and professional careers to crime solving and recovering loved ones. I am convinced psychic readings of this magnitude are worth more than $4 a minute.

Customers find variety of merchandise at flea market

Perhaps one man's trash truly is another man's treasure.

An antique sewing machine, a 1950s TV set, a black ceramic lamp of a naked woman arching her back and holding the light globe in her hands above her head and an old-fashioned washing machine cluttered Weber Arena this weekend.

All these items and more made up Kansas State Rowing Association's first flea market from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Saturday and noon to 5 p.m. on Sunday.

On Saturday, shoppers could buy a paper grocery bag and fill it with clothes for $3. Besides clothing, exercise equipment, books, movies, lawn mowers, bicycles, toys, neon beer signs and other knickknacks abounded.

Manhattan residents donated all of the items sold. The rowers distributed bright-colored hand bills throughout the community. Those who wanted to donate put the bills outside their homes along with their donations.

"We got a lot bigger response from the Manhattan community than we thought," Philip Henke, president of KSRA, said.

The rowers planned on needing only four bins for storage but ended up using seven to house all the items they collected.

Brenda Fergen and her daughter Katelyn Lubbers, 8, both Manhattan residents, found several items to buy. Fergen said she also donated some of her old possessions to the flea market.

"When you have to leave part of your family here to take stuff home and then come back, you know you got too much," Fergen said. "Grandma came all the way from South Dakota just for this."

Fergen said she and her family took home a bed spread, lots of clothes, books, two squirt guns and two kick balls.

"We found all kinds of stuff here," she said. "If I had the room, I'd get some of this exercise stuff."

The rowers spent about $900 putting the market together and hit profit about 30 minutes after they opened Saturday. Their goal was to raise $6,000, and they ended up with $4,600, counting about 600 shoppers at the flea market.

Jean Heffel, another Manhattan resident, said she loves flea markets and she goes often.

"Just when I can't resist the urge," Heffel said. "Some old ladies my age like to gamble. I go to flea markets instead."

Heffel said she usually ends up taking most of the things she buys at flea markets to other places such as churches, but she still has fun shopping.

Selina Cammer, senior in animal science, said she usually doesn't go to flea markets, but her roommates convinced her to go Saturday. She said she found a few quirky items among all the merchandise. For one, she heard that some people had donated underwear, which she said she hoped the rowers threw away. She said selling half-burned candles also surprised her.

"I thought that was a little strange," she said.

The rowers said they threw the underwear away and said they thought that whoever bought the

The Kansas State Rowing Association put on a flea market Saturday and Sunday to raise money for the program. All items sold at the flea market were donated.

1950s television planned to turn it into a fish aquarium. Henke said the neon beer signs were especially popular, and he went ahead and bought a bar.

Cammer and another one of her friends bought books, and Cammer's roommate ended up buying a barbecue grill for $15.

"They say it's supposed to work," she said.

Overall, Cammer as well as the others, said the flea market was fun, whether the shoppers tried out exercise equipment or sifted through old clothes.

"It's an experience," Cammer said.

AMES, Iowa — Although Josh Scooby and Eli Roberson normally don't play large roles on K-State's defensive front, the pairing might have been the unit's biggest asset Saturday in the Wildcats' 42-3 rout of Iowa State.

Before the contest, K-State paid much attention to the Cyclone offensive attack, which came in averaging nearly 415 yards per game.

For that reason alone, offensive coordinator Ron Hudson's gameplan was about as simple as it possibly could be — keep the ball on the ground and keep the clock ticking.

"When you're rushing the ball, what happens is you're keeping the defense off the field, and that's exactly how it worked out," Hudson said after the game. "We tried to throw it a couple times, but the fact that we could run it, keep the clock running and keep the defense off the field was the biggest plan we had."

Hudson's big plan turned into big yards for Scooby and Roberson and an even bigger win for the Wildcats — now two wins shy of bowl eligibility with three games remaining in the season.

But the biggest gain on the day might have come on the national level. With several outlets criticizing his unit's talent level, Hudson said the win helped the Cats gain some national respect on offense.

"We really challenged our players because there are some people that said, quite frankly, that we couldn't get it done against a winning football team like this, and our players just responded tremendously," he said.

In fact, the Cats responded to the challenge almost as quickly as Hudson posed it.

K-State capped a nine-play, 80-yard drive with a 35-yard fade pass from Roberson to senior wideout Ricky Lloyd in the right corner of the end zone to

Diamondbacks win World Series' game 7

BY BEN WALKER
The Associated Press

PHOENIX — The final comeback belonged to the Arizona Diamondbacks, and it was the greatest of all.

Luis Gonzalez hit an RBI single to cap a two-run rally off Mariano Rivera in the bottom of the ninth inning, and Arizona stunned the New York Yankees 3-2 in Game 7 of the World Series on Sunday night.

The Yankees were only two outs from their fourth straight World Series title when it all fell apart.

Tony Womack tied it with an RBI double and, after Craig Counsell was hit by a pitch to load the bases, Gonzalez blooped a soft single to center field.

Rivera, who had saved 23 straight postseason games, could do nothing but watch the ball fall in to end the Yankees' dynasty.

What began as a November duel between Curt Schilling and Roger Clemens climaxed with the Diamondbacks winning the title in just their fourth year of existence. It was the fastest rise in history, breaking the mark of five years set by the 1997 Florida Marlins.

The Diamondbacks did it by bouncing back from two of the toughest losses in Series history. They dropped Games 4 and 5 at Yankee Stadium, blowing two-run leads in the bottom of the ninth both times.

Randy Johnson, at 38, earned the victory in relief. He also won Game 6 on Saturday night, a 15-2 romp.

Johnson and many other Arizona old-timers such as Mark Grace, Matt

Williams and Mike Morgan won their first championship ring.

The Yankees, the team that would not give up, nearly won it for the city that would not give in. A highly motivated bunch, they showed extra resolve after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in New York.

The Yankees were a home run swing away from elimination in the first round against Oakland and lost the first two games at Bank One Ballpark.

But back in the desert, they looked lost.

Alfonso Soriano's solo homer off Schilling put New York ahead 2-1 in the eighth. Rivera, the most dominant reliever in postseason history, set down the Diamondbacks in the bottom half.

Then in the ninth, Arizona rallied. Grace led off with a single and Rivera threw away Damian Miller's bunt for an error, putting runners at first and second.

Jay Bell bunted into a force play at third, but Womack lined a tying double to the right-field corner. Counsell, who scored the winning run in Game 7 with Florida in 1997, was hit by a pitch.

With the infield in, Gonzalez hit it hard enough for a game-winning single that set off fireworks, pounding music and deafening cheers.

The Yankees fell to 5-6 overall in deciding Game 7s of the Series.

Schilling was nearly untouchable at the start. The first pitcher to start three games in a Series since Minnesota's Jack Morris in 1991, he once again showed no ill effects from working on three days' rest.

Schilling allowed only one hitter to reach through six innings, and even that guy did not last long on the bases. Paul O'Neill, playing his final game before retiring, was thrown out trying to stretch a double into a triple in the first.

But given a 1-0 lead in the sixth on Danny Bautista's RBI double, Schilling gave it back.

A strange wind started swirling through the ballpark to start the top of the seventh. Maybe it was a precursor of what was to come because moments later, Arizona had blown its edge.

Schilling retired 16 straight hitters before slumping Derek Jeter led off with a single and O'Neill followed with a single in front of center fielder Steve Finley.

Up came Bernie Williams, and Yankees manager Joe Torre had no intention to bunt with his No. 3 hitter. Besides, Williams has not had a sacrifice since 1996.

With Miguel Batista and Brian Anderson warming in the Arizona bullpen, Williams grounded into a force play that left runners at the corners.

Tino Martinez tied it with an RBI single, and Schilling escaped further trouble by getting two fly balls. Finley ran a long way into the right-center field gap to track down Shane Spencer's drive that ended the inning.

Clemens, pitching the biggest game of his great career, worked out of several early jams. The Diamondbacks caught up to him in the sixth after Finley led off with a single.

Bautista was next, and many people thought the man with five RBIs in Saturday's 15-2 romp would blunt. Arizona manager Bob Brenly once again crossed up his critics and let Bautista swing away, and it worked.

Bautista hit a drive into the left-center gap, and Clemens simply stood on the mound with his right hand on hip, watching the play unfold.

Finley scored easily, and Bautista was nailed at third on a fast, acrobatic relay by Jeter.

Clemens, prone to being too pumped-up for big games, kept himself calm on the mound in the early going. Composed, he talked to catcher Jorge Posada before big pitches and listened to pitching coach Mel Stottlemyre's advice in the dugout.

The Rocket was more revved in other ways. He dropped a toss at first base while tripping over the bag for an error, and later swung so hard that he stumbled across home plate.

Clemens was pulled after 6 1-3 innings with 10 strikeouts. He left without a Game 7 victory, the only thing missing on his Hall of Fame resume.

The usually steady Yankees looked shaky in the field, again. Soriano and Clemens made errors and the noisy crowd seemed to cause confusion on a couple other balls.

New York made seven errors against Arizona after committing a total of only five in the past three World Series.

Asked before the game to describe his team's mood, Torre said, "There's a lot of nervousness."

"It's anxiety," he said.

KU football coach fired during 5th losing season

BY DOUG TUCKER
The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — Terry Allen, the only coach in Kansas football history to keep his job after four straight losing seasons, could not make it through a fifth.

Vowing to raise the lowly Jayhawks to the top of the Big 12, athletic director Al Bohl announced Sunday that Allen had been dismissed. Defensive coordinator and secondary coach Tom Hayes will be in charge the final three games, but has no guarantee beyond that.

Allen, 20-33 at Kansas and increasingly unpopular with alumni, urged everyone to get behind the new coach.

"I'm sorry we were not successful," Allen said, while Bohl and Hayes waited to come to the front of the room and speak.

Under intense pressure to deliver a winning season in Bohl's first season as his boss, Allen, 44, faced the NCAA's toughest schedule.

Besides Big 12 powers Nebraska, Oklahoma, K-State and Texas, the Jayhawks also played UCLA. A 51-7 loss to No. 2 Nebraska on Saturday night — after he already had been told he was fired — left the Jayhawks 2-6, 1-5 in the conference.

"We stumbled early on some things we needed to do. But the reality of the situation is, this is the toughest league in college football," Allen said.

Bohl, who led revivals at Toledo and Fresno State in lesser conferences, said he would tolerate nothing less than championship football.

"I really believe what our objective should be at Kansas is to try to play in that Big 12 championship game," Bohl said, "because if you play in that game and win it, you'll be playing for the national championship."

Cats impressive against Iowa State, will win at Nebraska

I am going to go out on a limb here and assume you've been keeping up on a little something we do here at the Collegian called "Pigskin Picks."

All season long I have picked out five college football games each week, and four of my writers and I put it all on the line for a prize you'll never find out about — ok, it's a case of Natty and a bag of Harvest Cheddar Sun Chips.

Anyway, those of you who religiously follow your Collegian sports writers' picks have done all right this season, maybe even made enough money for a Dilly Bar at Dairy Queen or something.

Even on those weeks when I put my pride aside and bet against the Cats, I'm usually right on the money. It's a hard thing to root for the Sooners or Aggies, but sometimes you just know that it won't be K-State's day. Which brings me to my point.

It was going to be a tough sale to get me to pick the Cats this week. I was preparing to hole up and stay hidden for a year or two after picking the Huskers and suffering the wrath of Fourum callers, and why not? Nebraska simply has dominated college football this fall, while K-State has floundered at the bottom of the Big 12 cellar, right?

But that all changed with a 42-point win in Ames, Iowa, last weekend. As I sat in the Jack Trice Stadium pressbox prior to the game, thinking about all the squandered opportunities the Wildcats have suffered through this season,

I wondered what would happen on this Saturday.

Would K-State stumble on the road to another team the Cats should beat?

Would the multitude of fans wearing purple on the stadium's east side make the sad trip back to Kansas wondering what went wrong — again?

Would the Wildcats' bowl hopes be dashed in a 60-minute Ames instant?

Would Dawson and Joey get back together even though they're so far away from each other?

The answers: no, no, no, and I don't know, I don't watch 'Dawson's Creek.' Seriously, I don't. Ok, every now and then when my girlfriend makes me, and sometimes when I feel lonely ... but, uh, back to the task at hand.

K-State's demolishing of the Cyclones has given me a real reason to believe in the Cats this weekend. I'm going to say it and stand by it. I don't think the Huskers can stop Josh Scobey. I don't think Nebraska can contain the Wildcats' all-time leader in touchdowns when he's running behind a healthy offensive line.

More than that, I don't think the Huskers can move the ball on a K-State defense that is getting better every time it sits down for a meal — that's six times daily, for the record.

So, pigskin pals, trust your fearless leader, and call your bookie. The Cats are headed to Lincoln this weekend, and this time when they come home, they'll be one win richer.

Cats 35, Huskers 7.

corner. Snyder said the defense did well to stop one of the Big 12's top quarterbacks.

"I don't think it was him — I think it was us," Snyder said. "We just played very, very well against him and did a nice job on forcing him to pull it down, and then, more importantly, did an even greater job of not letting him out on scrambles — that's where he scares the daylight out of you. It did me, anyway. He's such an elusive runner."

K-State faced a similar type of quarterback last week when the Wildcats took Kansas behind the shed in a 40-6 win. Layhawk QB Mario Kinsey had some success running the ball last week, making K-State defenders miss in several keepers. Wallace, on the other hand, did not see the daylight much.

"When I say we get better, you go back and look at last week and the week before — the youngster from KU scrambled a lot and we let him out, and we missed a lot of lot of tackles on him," Snyder said. "But this week we tackled rather well."

The improved defense kept Wallace with his face in the turf for much of the game, either sacked or stopped at the line by the Cat opposition.

In fact, it seemed that every time Wallace or Haywood attempted to flee from K-State's defensive line, someone was always there for the stop. Haywood hit a brick wall from the beginning, finishing with just six yards on the ground after averaging 120.4 coming into the contest.

During the Wildcat's four-game losing streak earlier this season, the defense held just two opponents to less than 100 yards rushing. In contrast, the defense has been the Rock of Gibraltar in K-State's four wins, allowing fewer than 50 yards of rushing offense three times.

In the victory over the Cyclones, K-State again proved it is a team that can stall both facets of the offense, holding Iowa State to 23 yards rushing and 151 yards passing.

"This has to be one of the best defensive performances we've had," linebacker Ben Leber said. "This is where we want to be as a team right now, and it's fun to be out there and play with confidence."

However, that confidence still is something new for this defensive unit. K-State was held without a defensive score in 2001 until Milton Proctor's fourth-quarter interception return for a touchdown, and Derrick Yates' first-quarter interception marked the Cats' first turnover since Texas Tech.

"We had to make a statement today to define what Kansas State football is all about," sophomore linebacker Terry Pierce said. "Being able to play defense like this at a time like this is unexplainable."

Yates said it felt good to see the team come back from where it was earlier in the season. It was important to play well against a strong team such as Iowa State and prove the unit is still capable of shutting an offense down, he said.

"Our backs were against the wall, and we did the things we had to do to win today," Yates said. "That makes winning a lot of fun when you play this well."

When the Iowa State fans had seen enough, defensive tackle Tank Reese said it brought a smile to his face.

"When Josh (Buhl) got that fumble recovery, I looked up and saw all the fans starting to leave," Reese said. "I just thought, 'Man, this one's over.'" begin the game with a tone that would dominate the day.

"It was very important because if we get off to a good start we get the momentum," Roberson said. "First drive we just wanted to go out there and get something done, and the guys stepped up and we got it done."

After Tony Yelk's 31-yard field goal with 14:08 in the second quarter brought the Cyclones to within four, K-State used a lot of Eli Roberson and even more Josh Scobey to lock down what might have been the Cats' most complete game of the year.

"I think it's a matter of our football team getting a little bit better," head coach Bill Snyder said. "I just think we have gradually started to get ourselves better. We're starting to make some improvement, and that's the issue."

The Cats' improvements were measured on many levels.

K-State gained 343 yards on the ground, more than 100 more than what the Wildcats came into the contest averaging (233.3), and stopped nearly every Iowa State offensive threat in the game. Snyder even was pleased with the kicking game after true freshman Joe Rheem converted on all six extra point opportunities.

K-State defensive back Derrick Yates breaks up a pass intended for Iowa State wideout Jamaul Montgomery. The Wildcats' defense kept the Cyclones to three points en route to their second straight win.

But it was Scobey who stole the show for the second straight game, rushing for what would have been a career-high 172 yards on 32 carries if not for his 204-yard performance last weekend against Kansas.

"That's what I came to Kansas State for — to do things like this and help this team win and help this program and accomplish some goals that I set for myself. That's what it's all about," Scobey said.

While the senior fell short of setting a new personal rushing record, Scobey did manage to set a new school mark with his 27th career rushing touchdown with 9:53 to go in the fourth quarter.

The tailback's record-setter capped off a 12-play, 71-yard drive that ate up 5:03 and gave the Cats a 35-3 lead late in the game.

It was Scobey's final rushing attempt of the game, but following the contest the senior said he could have run all day.

"It always feels good when I get rolling," he said.

"I got rolling and I felt good, and I couldn't stop. When it's rolling like that, it's hard to stop it."

Scobey wasn't the only one to have success on the ground. Roberson, finished with 131 yards and two touchdowns on 22 carries in the game.

K-State's next step toward its revised goal of becoming bowl eligible comes next week in Lincoln, Neb., against the No. 2 Huskers.

"I think this win will help us a whole lot because we've got our confidence up and going heading into Nebraska," Roberson said.

"Iowa State is a really good squad, and we just really wanted to get this win and look forward to Nebraska next week."

KSU volleyball sweeps Iowa State

BY DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

K-State volleyball extended its winning streak against Iowa State to 12 straight over the weekend at Ahearn Field House.

The Cats (14-7, 10-5) made quick work of the Cyclones (14-16, 1-14), sending Iowa State packing after three games Saturday night. The shutout was only the latest in K-State's dominance over Iowa State. The Cats have taken 36 of the last 37 games in the series and haven't lost a match since 1995 when the Cyclones defeated K-State in five games.

"This team works very hard, and I knew they wanted to come out and prove they could play better than the last time they faced Iowa State," head coach Suzie Fritz said. "When this team pulls it together and plays Kansas State volleyball, we can compete with anyone."

K-State took the match 30-16, 30-26, 30-16 behind solid performances from sophomore Carl Jensen and junior Jenny Pollard. The two outside hitters led the team with a combined 36 kills and 24 digs in the match.

Jensen turned in her second straight double-double, registering 19 kills on .300 hitting to go along with 10 digs.

Pollard also tallied a double-double, the tenth of the season for the junior by posting a 17-kill, 14-dig match.

As a whole, K-State dominated every phase of the match.

The Cats used an early 6-1 lead in game one to grab the early momentum and never looked back, using a .471 hitting percentage to cruise to an easy 30-16 win.

Both teams struggled to convert on kill opportunities in game two, though, and Iowa State even outlit the Cats .071 to .043, but a late Wildcat run was too much, as K-State outlasted the Cyclones 30-26.

In the final game, the Cats played streak volleyball by putting together a 16-1 run with the score close at 8-6 to finish the match with a 30-16 win. K-State managed a season-best .500 hitting percentage while keeping Iowa State to .063 on the game.

K-State hits the road for its next action. The Wildcats will travel to Austin, Texas, on Wednesday to take on the Texas Longhorns (14-8, 7-7) at Gregory Gym in a matchup of two teams with similar records. The match will be the first Olympic sport to be broadcast over the Internet by the Big 12 Conference. Fans can access the match by going to the conference's Web site at www.big12sports.com.

But Phillips said once the word is out, Niagara will be a hot seller.

"I see sales being pretty strong," he said. "Just like Red Bull — it's the same thing."

Mixing alcohol with an aphrodisiac should not cause any problems, Heff said.

"It's not harmful to mix it with alcohol," he said. "It's a Make-you-feel-good drink."

"Some women it had a larger effect than on others. It varied from person to person, like alcohol."

While Williams said some customers have reported little to no effects, others have come back for more.

"I definitely try not to drink it alone, you know," said Niagara fan Diane Shelton. "I'd have to go for a long jog and a cold shower. I mean, why waste it?"

—ABC News contributed to this story.

Female Collegian staff members review Niagra

The new female version of Viagra, Niagra, has hit store shelves and bars everywhere. Two Collegian female staffers say the drink, which is supposed to increase female libido, does little. In fact, mixing the liquid with alcohol could have consequences.

Bertuglia

Michelle Bertuglia

A few minutes after drinking the smooth medicine-like Niagra, every tense muscle in my body relaxed. A smile stretched my lips, and I felt different, calm, almost high.

As concentration waned and my mind roamed, I felt as if I had had a few alcoholic drinks. But I knew differently. I had just drunk a bottle of this aphrodisiac that was supposed to stimulate me and make me want to rip the clothes off the nearest male. While sex did sound great after the drink kicked in, it definitely did not make me want it any more than a normal 23-year-old woman wants sex.

"This is not making me feel anything," I complained to my co-workers as I sipped the blue, berry-flavored drink. A few minutes later, I squinted my eyes, feeling the beginnings of a headache coming on. After the drink was gone, I felt different, slightly buzzed and happy.

"I feel like when you just start drinking and you are starting to get drunk, but not really there yet," I proclaimed to my co-workers who were persistently hounding me as to how I was feeling. The buzz-like feeling did not last long, though. Just a few minutes after the drink was gone, I began to feel exactly like I had all day long. I was not any more interested in sex than I normally am.

wants sex.

Maybe this drink does inspire some women to feel more sexy or in the mood, but I think it would just relax the participants and possibly make sex less tense or nerve-wracking.

Unable to concentrate really after drinking it, I think this drink could be very dangerous if mixed with alcohol. For many, alcohol is a way to lose your inhibitions. Mixing this drink with alcohol really could make someone throw caution to the wind.

The drink seemed to wear off after about 30 minutes. If one drank several of them in an hour, I think he or she probably would end up in a drunken state. The repercussions could be bad.

drinking Niagra, but to me, it all just seemed like a fun placebo. In a social situation, it might be easier for a woman to drink a bottle of Niagra and loosen up. Although Niagra does seem harmless by itself, there might be some dangerous consequences for mixing it with alcohol. One or two shots mixed with the drink might not cause severe damage, but if the concoction becomes a woman's drink of choice throughout the night, she might be making herself susceptible to feeling more romantic than she normally would.

Niagra is for fun, and that is what it should be used for. Using it as an actual Viagra type stimulant will more often than not disappoint the user. Women should be careful when mixing it with alcohol as well.

Niagra might be an easy way to loosen up and have fun, but remembering that alcohol normally does that pretty well on its own is a vital to remember.

RAILROAD

questions, the group members looked at pictures on the walls and at the balcony of the church. Then they walked down the road to the oldest schoolhouse in Wabunsee County and to an old general store, which now is George's Jaguars.

Next, Pitts drove the group to a cemetery. He told the group members to find two different gravestones bearing two important names — Capt. William Mitchell and Peter McCutcheon.

McCutcheon, he said, has a historical novel written about him, "The White Slave," because he was switched at birth and raised by a black slave. Mitchell kept slaves in his home on their journey north and was a hero because he was caught and tortured and didn't tell anything about the Underground Railroad, Pitts said.

"Why was it called the Underground Railroad? Why not the Pony Express Underground?" he asked group members.

The railroad system was new technology at the time, group members discovered. Thus, people could converse comfortably about the railroad using all of its terminology in public.

"Today, it would be the Underground Internet," he said.

The group then planned to travel to Capt. Mitchell's home, a cabin by Pillsbury Crossing and a cave close to Manhattan Hill where slaves sometimes were hidden for a few days.

The group members said they were glad they had the opportunity to experience the history in the area — a history they previously did not know existed around Manhattan.

"I've lived here most of my life, and I didn't know about this," Elise Lambert, president of AESSA, said. "It's amazing."

if we continue to stick together, we will make it," he said.

Gergen reminded the audience of why public service matters. He said public service workers have been treated like second-class citizens in the recent past and are only paid a little bit more than minimum wage.

"We strip them of their dignity," he said. "When trouble hits, though, we have seen how much we depend on them."

Gergen said he strongly believes the country should encourage a culture of service among the young.

"It will transform the country and the people involved," he said. "If young people can find the inspiration in themselves, it will change our country."

Gergen said America has learned a lot about the nature of leadership through New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani and President Bush.

"Right from the moment Mayor Giuliani was about among the people, giving them courage. He did exactly what a leader should do — no B.S.," Gergen said.

forces. "Absolutely not," he replied.

Members of Congress said it is too early to tell how long the war will last or whether more ground troops will be needed.

"I think our enemies, the more they're convinced that we're in this for the long haul, the shorter this thing" might last, said Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., on "Fox News Sunday." Added Democratic Sen. Joseph Biden, the Foreign Relations Committee chairman: "It may very well be that as things move on," administration officials have to insert, or at least contemplate, a larger infusion of ground forces."

Joining Biden on CBS' "Face the Nation," Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., said, "I don't see where you're going to put a half a million men on the ground like we did in Vietnam or any of the large-scale efforts."

When the crisis came, President Bush grew, Gergen said.

"He has set sail, and the country can be grateful for that," he said.

K-State President Jon Wefald then was given the spotlight, as Gergen compared the parallels of Wefald's book, which captures the lessons of leadership, to the actions President Bush has taken so far.

"He has understood his own limitations, taken risks, made mistakes, gained our trust and had a sense of humor," Gergen said.

Last Saturday, Kansas State University swept three of the top national honors for collegiate publications.

The 2000 Royal Purple, the 2000 Royal Purple CD supplement and the 2000-01 Kansas State Collegian all won Pacemaker Awards from Associated Collegiate Press.

K-State was the only university in the nation whose yearbook and newspaper won both honors, considered the Pulitzer Prizes of collegiate journalism.

Also, K-State was the only Big 12 Conference university to win Pacemakers in newspaper and yearbook, and K-State was the sole winner in the yearbook CD competition.

Three Student Publications photojournalists won national awards for yearbook photojournalism: Matt Stamey, Kelly Glasscock and Justin Hayworth.

K-State's current publications also were winners in the convention's Best of Show. The 2001 Royal Purple won third in the Large Yearbook category, and the fall 2001 Collegian placed fourth for its terrorism/war coverage in the Daily Broadsheet category.

Last, but certainly not least, Royal Purple adviser Linda Puntney was inducted into the College Media Advisers Hall of Fame, celebrating two decades of award-winning media students and service to collegiate yearbooks.

The 2000 Royal Purple editor was Rachel Powers, the 2000 RP CD editor was Nathan Elliott and the 2001 RP editor was Wendy Schantz.

MOORE'S CODE

Maybe it's the large, fuzzy head. Or it might be the large, boisterous crowds that has K-State's popular mascot, Willie the Wildcat, speechless and searching for words. Regardless, the furry crowd-lover couldn't open up even to a small, intimate gathering of Moore Hall residents Monday night.

Willie didn't have to. His K-State chants and lively gestures were enough to keep the predominately female crowd entertained, and he still had enough time to make a valuable point.

The anonymous student dressed in Willie-garb was invited to Moore Hall to kick off the resident hall's Moore's Code event. The week of presentations attempts to inform residents of the importance of other forms of communication besides English.

Moore's Code also features informative sessions on Morse Code, Braille, sign language and foreign languages. Since Willie's not much of a talker, he was an obvious choice for Moore Hall President Craig Wanklyn.

"Not everybody can speak," Wanklyn said. "We wanted to open people's eyes a little. It's a difficult task for some people. And we were able to get Willie. It's a fun program."

But contacting the busy feline was a lesson in communication itself. Wanklyn couldn't speak directly to Willie. For starters, Willie can't talk. And second, his identity is kept a secret.

Since August, Wanklyn and hall representatives had been planning the week and worked with the cheer-leading squad to work around Willie's schedule.

Willie had a test Monday night and pep rallies to get Anthrax discovered at Pentagon disposed of quickly

BY LAURA MECKLER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Anthrax was detected inside the Pentagon and promptly removed, officials said Monday. Cleanup in the Senate office building where an anthrax-packed letter was opened proved more complicated.

Government agencies moved to test buildings around the country for the presence of anthrax spores, and officials at the Mayo Clinic unveiled a more rapid test for anthrax exposure.

Public health officials looked for patterns among the 10 people infected with inhalation anthrax and prepared guidelines for doctors trying to distinguish it from the flu. President Bush said he wants $175 million to buy mail-irradiation and other protective equipment for the Postal Service.

A postal facility in yet another government building tested positive for exposure — this time inside the Pentagon.

Anthrax spores were found in two mailboxes at a post office in the building. The entire office was decontaminated over the weekend, and further tests found no anthrax, officials said.

Further testing at the Food and Drug Administration showed how unreliable initial anthrax tests can be: Four mailrooms in Rockville, Md., that tested positive last week were cleared with further investigation.

And in New Jersey, postal workers at two mail stations thought contaminated were told to stop taking antibiotics after subsequent testing found no anthrax in West Trenton and only traces in Princeton.

Researchers at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., said Monday they might have a DNA test that promises better results, produced in 30 minutes instead of People without clothes, shelter, cars, food, money and love come to the Salvation Army to get the help they need.

Capt. Johnny Harsh, a Salvation Army soldier, said the agency's missions are too numerous to name.

"We are an agency that takes care of people when they fall through the cracks," he said.

The Salvation Army social services provides help to people who cannot pay rent, utility bills or gas for their car, housing when the homeless shelter is full and counseling for drug and alcohol rehabilitation.

"We take men who have problems with drugs and alcohol to Wichita or Kansas City," Harsh said. "They enter the program, live on-site free of charge. They help each other out and get life started again."

The Salvation Army receives funding from many different places, Harsh said. Each organization receives funds from the county. Donations from the United Way and the city of Manhattan total $50,000.

STATE IN BRIEF

Kline might enter race for Kansas attorney general

TOPEKA — Former state Rep. Phil Kline plans to declare this week whether he will run for attorney general next year, he said Monday.

Kline, who lost a high-profile congressional race last year, said his mind is mostly made up after mulling races for attorney general and Congress.

He scheduled a news conference for 11 a.m. Thursday at Shawnee City Hall in suburban Kansas City.

"We are encouraged and enthusiastic about the possibilities," said Kline, who added that he has traveled around Kansas and to Washington in considering his options.

In September, Kline withdrew his nomination for U.S. attorney for Kansas and said he wanted to consider other political opportunities. He cited the months-long wait for confirmation as well as the Sept. 11 terror attacks.

Tonganoxie nudist colony fighting to remain open

TONGANOXIE — Some Tonganoxie nudists hope the First Amendment gives them cover.

Camp Gaea, a 168-acre retreat for nudists, pagans and gays, has operated since 1982 with a special-use permit from Leavenworth County.

But the county board has declined to renew the permit, prompting a legal threat from the people who run the camp.

"People can be who they are without any accusations," said John Pearse, president of the board of directors at Earth Rising, which runs the camp. "That's all we want. We're not going to lie down and be run over."

Camp Gaea's permit expired earlier this year, but the county had allowed it to continue operating pending renewal.

Pearse said the camp, located seven miles north of Tonganoxie, is open year-round and has become a haven for people who might be discriminated against elsewhere.

Lawyers of KC pharmacist want charge dismissed

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Lawyers for a pharmacist accused of diluting chemotherapy drugs are seeking to have some charges dismissed, contending that prosecutors have failed to state how any cancer patients were harmed.

In a series of motions filed Monday in U.S. District Court, attorneys for Robert Courtney also asked that the trial — currently scheduled for next Feb. 4 — take place outside Missouri.

Courtney was indicted Aug. 23 on 20 counts of tampering with, misbranding and adulterating the chemotherapy drugs Gemzar and Taxol prescribed for eight cancer patients.

Courtney has pleaded innocent and remains detained without bond on a magistrate's order, even though prosecutors never requested that he be detained.

NATION IN BRIEF

By The Associated Press

Justice department plans to allocate victims' funds

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Justice Department is seeking public comment on a government program that will provide money to the relatives of those who died or were injured in the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

The Victims' Compensation Program, established by Congress in September, is to begin Dec. 21 and will dispense money — the amounts have not been determined — to cover lost wages and victims' pain and suffering.

The amount of the awards will depend on the harm to the claimant, the facts of the claim, and the individual circumstances of the claimant, the department said.

The Justice Department is in charge of setting up rules for the program and is seeking comment beginning Monday on many complex issues that must be ironed out.

Among the issues: how people should apply for compensation; whether the program should pay for victims' lawyers; and whether people who are not satisfied with their payment can appeal.

Holiday season spending feels effects of attacks

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The battered economy and terrorist events of the last two months have led some consumers to trim their holiday spending plans, but not as many as some experts expected, a new survey shows.

Despite a soaring unemployment rate, weakened consumer confidence, continued fallout from the Sept. 11 terror attacks and new worries about anthrax in the mail, 57 percent of consumers plan to spend the same amount for the holidays as they did last year, according to the survey released Monday by the Consumer Federation of America and the Credit Union National Association.

Of those polled, 28 percent plan to spend less this holiday season than last year.

In 2000, 56 percent of consumers said they planned to spend the same as they spent the previous year, while 24 percent planned to spend less.

People dressed in brightly-colored, feathered clothing danced counter-clockwise with plain-clothed people Monday in the Union Courtyard.

The activities were sponsored by the Union Program Council as part of the Festival of Nations.

"In the old days, they used to dance counter-clockwise," said Bruce Martin, director of the New Dawn Native Dancers. "We're doing that today."

The New Dawn Native Dancers is a group from Lawrence, Kan., that American Indian parents started to increase children and teen participation in community gatherings and PowWows.

"We're not only teaching the general public, but also our parents," Martin said.

Martin said he brought 14 group members who danced to about eight different songs. There are more than 15 tribes represented among the New Dawn Native Dancers, he said.

"We're all learning from each other. Each tribe does things a little bit differently," he said.

At the beginning of the festival, those attending sampled some American Indian foods which included: smoked chicken, fry bread and Indian cake.

Erica Smith, UJC multicultural chair, said she enjoyed the food.

"It really wasn't that authentic, though," she said.

Guests could take the recipes of the foods, which were printed in fliers, home with them. Martin said he enjoys younger children, so he was glad to see some students from Lee Elementary School attend. Smith, however, said she didn't see as many K-State students as she would have liked.

Lecture focuses on health care

BY ADAM LEE

Kansas State Collegian

The shortcomings of the American health care industry in comparison to other Western nations was the focus of the final speech in the fall 2001 Lou Douglas Lecture Series on Monday night.

The event featured Dr. Steffie Woolhandler, M.D., M.P.H., who spoke about "A National Health Program for the United States."

Woolhandler practices primary care and internal medicine at Cambridge City Hospital in Cambridge, Mass., and is an associate professor of medicine at Harvard University.

She also is a co-founder of Physicians for a National Health Program, or PNHP, an organization that focuses on the promotion of a national health care program that would provide medical treatment for all Americans.

Linda Teener, UFM director, stressed the local importance of the issue by saying that 15 to 20 percent of Kansans do not have health insurance. She said many Kansans are uninformed or unconcerned about the national health care issue.

"If you're young, if you're healthy, or if you have coverage, you don't think a lot about health insurance," Teener said.

In her lecture, Woolhandler said 39 million Americans were left uninsured in 2000 while most other developed countries already had national health care programs for their citizens in place.

She predicted that because of the struggling economy, the number of people who cannot afford the medical attention they need only will increase.

"Even people who hold onto their jobs often find that their employers cut back on insurance coverage," Woolhandler said.

Woolhandler presented the PNHP's call for a national health care program, in which every American receives a health care card assuring payment for needed care. Under the proposed program, doctors and hospitals would remain independent but non-profit, and patients still would have complete free choice in whom they saw and where.

She suggested local planning boards to allocate expensive technology, such as MRI machines, and to have doctors and hospitals negotiate fees and budgets with the government. Woolhandler said she envisions the program being funded by a progressive tax system based on income.

Woolhandler presented statistics that suggested many Americans aren't happy with their health care. She said this discontentment has surfaced in the last 30 years.

"The health insurance industry and HMO's are down in the basement of public esteem," Woolhandler said.

Leigh Fine, freshman in chemistry, said he never had been concerned with a national health care program before the lecture.

"I live with my parents. They take care of my health care. I was under my parents' plan. I was just sort of along for the ride," Fine said.

Fine found the information Woolhandler presented about the medical and business practices of HMO's alarming, but he said he wasn't sure if he was in favor of national health insurance.

Salvation Army to open restaurant in Aggieville

BY SARAH RICE

Kansas State Collegian

A new Aggieville restaurant operated by the Salvation Army will open its doors next spring.

Capt. Johnny Harsh, Salvation Army soldier, hopes to reach young people by establishing a restaurant and church at 1111 Moro St.

"Before we get the restaurant, we want to move our church," Harsh said.

"We are asking God to open doors for the Sunday before Thanksgiving."

After the church is moved from its current location at the senior center, volunteers will focus their attention on the restaurant.

Harsh said they first will go to local churches and ask for donations.

They also will sponsor car washes and other fund-raisers to reach their goal of $24,000.

The restaurant will feature live bands playing Christian rock.

Harsh said he will invite bands from churches to play.

Jonathan Allen, Salvation Army volunteer, said he hopes people will be attracted by the music.

"People will accidentally step into the place hearing good music," he said. "It's a nice place if you don't want to hang out around drunks."

Harsh said he is targeting Christian K-State students looking for weekend activities.

"For K-State students who are sold on the Lord — this is where can they get entertainment," he said. "We are hoping to attract with loud music and good food."

Allen said that although the restaurant will not look like a church, customers still can have a religious experience.

"You will come in there and the Spirit will be there," he said.

Harsh said that when the restaurant opens, it will be the only instance he knows of in history when a Salvation Army agency ran a restaurant.

He said he expects the project to be a big success.

Arnold Tyson, Salvation Army volunteer, said he thinks the project will be a big success. "The Lord has shown us," he said. "This is going to be big."

Harsh said the restaurant will also provide a place for training of K-State and Flint Hill Job Corps students.

"This will be more than a Christian thing," he said. "It will also be a community thing where people can get training and get ahead in life."

single day. If they need something and don't have the money, they can get vouchers from social services and get what they need."

Harsh said the store is for anybody who wants bargains.

"There are unbelievably nice clothes, even name brands, for just a few dollars," he said. "We are even cheaper than Wal-Mart."

Because the Salvation Army is a United Way agency, it is connected to a network, which allows them to better serve patrons and make sure they are really experiencing need.

"If you have ever been out on the street, you are going to be forced into a place inside yourself to lie, steal," Harsh said. "You do all you can to survive. We don't put people down for lying. We tell them we have been there."

The Salvation Army, in addition to social services and the thrift store, also is a disaster relief organization that has been helping in New York City after Sept. 11.

"What happened on Sept. 11 was a terrible thing," he said. "But we've got major disasters in our town on a daily basis."

The agency employs six people, but has over 50 volunteers.

"We get some volunteers from K-State," Harsh said. "Also, from Flint Hills Job Corps, the corrections department and the United Way."

Harsh said there are many opportunities for K-State students interested in volunteering.

"Many students help in social services, giving gas vouchers or counseling," he said. "Even if you do nothing but just listen, you might help that person a little. You never know what you might experience at the Salvation Army."

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Broadening Kansas horizons with broadband

The truth is out there, Kansas: the future of our state depends upon the affordable, dependable delivery of advanced telecommunications services to all of our state's communities, regardless of size or location.

So, what is an "advanced telecommunications service"? It boils down to one word: Broadband — high-speed access to the Internet. If today's dial-up access is sipping information through a straw, then broadband access is like guzzling it through a firehose.

Cindy Zapletal

As we continue on into the Information Age, that data "guzzling" will be a necessity for growth and competitiveness in the global economy. Kansas is going to need broadband to succeed and prosper — which is why SBC Southwestern Bell is working to deliver it throughout our state.

Fortunately, several technologies for obtaining high-speed Internet access are available today, including Digital Subscriber Line (DSL), satellite and cable modem. Kansans deserve broadband access through the technology that best meets their individual needs.

Unfortunately, current laws discourage the type of investment that our telecom network needs to support widespread broadband delivery. The regulations governing service providers are inconsistent; there are different rules for different technologies — and that prevents fair and open competition.

The rules should be the same for all service providers, to foster as much competition as possible. More competition means more choices and better value for customers. And regulatory resources should be dedicated to protecting consumers, ensuring service quality and holding telecommunications companies to their promises.

With the right changes to our laws, companies will invest, broadband will flourish and Kansas will continue to grow and succeed. Together, we will prosper.

Scraping by on $5.15 per hour just doesn't cut it for many Manhattan residents.

A recent K-State study found a single parent with two children needs to make — at a minimum — $8.70 an hour, to be able to purchase basic living necessities in Manhattan.

Janet Jackson, Manhattan Living Wage Coalition coordinator, said, "Anyone who works 40 hours a week should be able to support a family. They should be able to provide a roof over their head and buy food and clothing for their family. That is not the case in Manhattan."

The Coalition is doing its best to make sure large corporations with a vested interest in the city pay a living wage to their workers.

The Manhattan Living Wage Coalition started its quest three years ago. Its aim is to incite new corporations in Manhattan who withdraw funds from the city's economic development fund to be responsible for the wages they pay their workers.

We support the Coalition and agree that large corporations that utilize city money for their business should pay a living wage to all their workers.

Jackson said it best when she said, "One family with major economic stresses put stress on the entire community. By paying a living wage, we are contributing to a healthier community."

OVERDUE DESTRUCTION

Demolition of Denison Hall welcomed by university

Unless you have serious information assimilation problems, you've probably heard Lafene Health Center is moving. For the past week or so, everyone from President Jon Wefald to the lowliest medical assistant at Lafene has raved about the many benefits of changing its location.

Unfortunately, not very many people have talked about the main advantage K-State will reap from the move: the demolition of Denison Hall. Lafene's move will enable the Department of English to move into the building where Lafene is currently housed.

Micah Hawkinson

vacate Denison and finally allow its long-overdue destruction. At last, after years of waiting, the students and faculty of K-State will watch with joy and awe as the great evil known as Denison Hall becomes a pile of rubble. I'm going to bring popcorn.

Why, you might ask, does Denison deserve such hatred, such pure and utter loathing? Simply put, it is a travesty — an ugly, pitiful, little cube of a building that can be improved by about 20 kilos of plastique.

Denison (or Condemnison, as it is affectionately called by some English professors), has been a scourge to our campus almost since its construction in 1960. It apparently was built during the brief period of architectural history when the horrid little flat-topped box motif was the cutting edge.

It also has been plagued by leaky ceilings, asbestos removal problems, mold and leaky water pipes.

Perhaps the most dramatic of these problems was the breaking of the steam pipes.

"It was like looking through a sulfurous vent to the underworld," Elizabeth Dodd, professor of English, said.

Denison Hall also has a rich history of other types of problems. For example, during summer 2000, the office of Tom Murray, professor of English, was covered in black mold as the result of another pipe break. He lost several hundred dollars' worth of books as well as some African wall hangings. Although the department replaced his books, Murray said the wall hangings were irreplaceable.

During the same summer, the English department lost many of its copies of English Masters students' thesis papers to mold.

"It was a terrible loss," Dodd said. Steam pipes aren't the only pipes that have broken in Denison — several semesters ago, water pipes under the false wooden floors (in first-floor classrooms) cracked, flooding the rooms. Classes had to be canceled for two days during the cleanup process.

Although leaky ceilings are no longer a large problem in Denison Hall, they were for years. My mother remembers the roof leaking when she went to school at K-State in the mid-'70s. The experience convinced her that "no building should have a flat roof — flat roofs leak."

Besides having innumerable structural problems, Denison Hall also has no windows in its classrooms. There are half a dozen classrooms on the ground floor and the same number on the second floor. None of the rooms have any windows, which means they must rely completely on fluorescent lighting. This contributes to the dungeon-like feel Denison's spartan architecture already gives, even without the harshness of artificial light.

On top of everything else, Denison Hall blocks the magnificent architecture of Hale Library, making it almost impossible to see the intricate stone carvings and wrought-iron flower sculptures on the side of the library. In every sense, the building is a blight on the face of the campus.

So rejoice, students! In just a few short months, Denison Hall will be ready for destruction.

If you need another good reason to party (although I don't know why you would after K-State's win against Iowa State this weekend), this is it. When drinking to the death of Denison, just be sure not to have more than 0.5 drinks.

Stereotypes based on appearances detrimental to society, should be re-examined

Men and women are as similar as apples and pineapples.

Sure, they sound similar. But, when the two try to get together, it usually ends up in one big mess. Especially when it comes to courting.

As the stereotypes go, men are the strong, silent types, stoic in emotions. Women are the loving, nurturing, passive members of society.

All that is a big bunch of crap as far as I'm concerned. We, as a society, have managed to paint ourselves into an emotional corner where any deviation from the norm is unacceptable.

I think the origin of problems like this is, men are as complicated as water, whereas, women more resemble Wild Cherry Pepsi.

The complexity of interaction between the sexes shows itself best in Aggieville on a Saturday night.

Women walk around dressed to the hilt, every single accessory and stroke of make-up carefully crafted and thoughtout, trying to impress men whose only goal for the night are to get drunk and hook up, or get in a fight.

The preparation process alone for women includes hours of eyebrow-plucking, leg-waxing and layers and layers of makeup.

Then, they get to their hair.

Guys try to find a clean shirt, run their fingers through their hair and get in a quick tooth-brushing before gallivanting to the pubs.

That's not to say there aren't guys who spend hours molding the perfect frosted hair spike or girls who prefer to wear jeans and a ball cap out. I'm saying women put entirely too much effort into impressing guys who are more like Homer Simpson with a doughnut.

Ooooooh, sprinkles.

I think those women are really trying to impress the other women in the bar so they can establish some sort of hotness authority, similar to deer rubbing their antlers against trees to mark their territory.

With their overdone make up and high heels, they strut through bars looking their competitors up and down like some sort of USDA inspector.

If they happen to find someone who they think looks better than them, they roll their eyes and give the big "I can't believe she'd wear that out" sigh.

In response, men stare at these women like they had something to offer beyond their blush and push-up bras.

But this works because women realize guys couldn't care less about such obvious efforts to get attention. They look for the most attractive package they can find, then hone in on it like a lion on a ribeye.

Not to be outdone by the ladies, men have their own way of attracting women: being a jackass.

Reminiscent of elementary school days where you picked on the girl you liked, guys still use the bad boy approach to appear mysterious and intriguing. The girls flock to them, only to come crying back to their nice guy friends after they realize there was no mystery. He really was an ass.

If, by chance, two people do hit it off in Aggieville, there's still no guarantee that anything will develop. The guy still has to take the risk and ask the woman out.

Men almost are always the pursuers and women are the pursued. There seems to be a social stigma about a woman calling up a guy and asking him out.

Why is this a taboo? Having a woman call a guy and ask him out on a date would be like a Fortune 500 CEO randomly calling him up and offering a job.

It's what dreams are made of.

The burden of asking someone out on a date should not rest on the shoulders of men alone. It can be a very nerve-racking thing to do and leaves the guy vulnerable to rejection. A lack of open communication both ways might sabotage a budding relationship.

For instance, a young man and woman have been talking and spending time together. But the guy doesn't know if the young woman likes him or is just being polite, so he doesn't say anything.

If, for once, she would say she likes him, too, a possible missed opportunity might come to fruition.

This also directly conflicts with the stereotype of men not showing emotions. They have to stick their necks out and show their feelings with no guarantee the other person feels the same way. Yet, when men suffer pain or sadness, tears are unacceptable.

Until we realize that men and women are different in their complexity levels, women will still be frustrated because guys don't react the way women expect. Guys will still wonder why saying, "hi," doesn't do the trick.

Maybe it's something men and women have to learn for themselves. We shouldn't be distracted by pretty packaging or intrigued by mysterious jackasses.

Unless we stop judging fruit by the peels, we're going to end up courting rotten fruit.

States in Microsoft suit face decision of splitting

BY D. IAN HOPPER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The coalition of 18 states that joined the federal antitrust suit against Microsoft faces the prospect of splitting.

Some states are preparing to accept a settlement with the software giant, while one is rejecting it and others have it under consideration.

New York is planning to sign the agreement with some added restrictions on Microsoft, a source close to the deliberations said Monday.

New York officials have been in touch with Microsoft and Justice Department lawyers, the source said.

Meanwhile, Massachusetts Attorney General Thomas F. Reilly said the settlement has too many loopholes and refused to agree without large changes.

"Microsoft will use this agreement to crush competition," Reilly said Sunday.

Representatives from North Carolina, Florida, Kentucky, Iowa and Maryland declined to comment, saying they still were reviewing details of the 21-page settlement.

Top lawyers for 18 states and the District of Columbia have until Tuesday morning to tell a judge whether they will join the deal agreed to Thursday night by the Justice Department and Microsoft.

Reilly and his staff spent the weekend scrutinizing the agreement.

"Every definition is riddled with exceptions," Reilly said.

In Illinois, Attorney General Jim Ryan said he is inclined to sign the agreement.

"I am pleased that the Microsoft case appears headed for resolution and that Illinois consumers will have gained a freer and more competitive marketplace as a result," Ryan said.

The states' discussions Monday reflect their many divergent views and different levels of commitment throughout the case as well as the awesome effort by the coalition leaders — including Iowa and Connecticut — to keep the states together.

The proposed settlement would require Microsoft to give independent monitors full access to its books and plans for the next five years, and to provide information to help rivals make their products compatible with Windows.

It also would give computer manufacturers more latitude to remove Windows features and replace them with competing products.

If any states refuse the settlement, they could try to scuttle the deal by convincing a judge that it is not in the public interest. They also may continue the suit on their own.

California recently hired a top Washington lawyer, Brendan Sullivan, on behalf of the states. In case any states split off, Sullivan would be their chief advocate in a penalty trial that would take place early next year.

Microsoft spokesman Vivek Varma said the settlement is a fair and reasonable compromise, and that the company is hopeful the states sign on.

Separately, the European Commission said Monday it was pressing forward with its probe into Microsoft.

The commission is investigating whether Microsoft had violated antitrust laws by bundling its Media Player into Windows.

The European Commission said Microsoft might have used illegal practices to extend its dominance in personal computers into server markets.

Most suspects in unrelated charges released by authorities

BY KAREN GULLO
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Most of the people arrested on unrelated criminal charges by investigators probing the Sept. 11 attacks have been released, the White House said Monday.

"The lion's share of the people are not still in custody," White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said.

"The overwhelming number of the people were detained, they were questioned and then they've been released."

The White House later said Fleischer was referring only to those detained on unrelated criminal charges. But neither the White House nor the Justice Department would say how many of the more than 1,000 people arrested or detained so far remain in custody.

That prompted new complaints from civil liberties groups.

"The secrecy surrounding them is unacceptable," said Lucas Guttentag, director of the immigrants' rights project at the American Civil Liberties Union.

"In order for the public to have confidence in the fairness of the investigation and make sure individual rights are preserved, the government needs to disclose more," he said.

The ACLU has filed a Freedom of Information Act request for information on those detained in connection with the investigation.

Justice Department spokeswoman Mindy Tucker said grand jury secrecy rules and judges' orders prevent the department from releasing information.

Records on those facing unrelated criminal charges are available from state and local law enforcement agencies, she said.

Investigators have detained or arrested 1,147 people since the suicide hijackings as part of a massive dragnet to find associates of the hijackers and track down terrorists planning additional attacks.

Department officials have released daily figures about the number of people in custody but in most cases have not disclosed their names, where they are being detained or whether they have been released.

The arrested and detained fall into three categories: those detained on criminal charges, usually unrelated to the hijackings; those detained on immigration violations; and those detained as material witnesses.

Officials said 185 have been detained for immigration violations, but they have declined to provide numbers for the other categories.

The number detained as material witnesses, however, is believed to be the smallest of the three groups.

No one in the United States has been charged with participating in or helping to plot the attacks, although several have been charged with helping the hijackers obtain false identifications.

Three people facing criminal charges growing out of the Sept. 11 investigation pleaded innocent in U.S. District Court in Alexandria on Monday. All three face trial in mid-December.

Kenys Galicia, a notary public, is charged with falsely notarizing forms stating two of the hijackers, Abdulaziz Alomari and Ahmed Saleh Alghamdi, were Virginia residents.

Luis A. Martinez-Flores, 28, is charged with falsely certifying that two other hijackers, Khalid Almihdhar and Hani Hanjour, lived with him in Falls Church, Va.

Mohamed Abdi, a security guard, is charged with forging rental housing subsidy checks. Those charges are unrelated to the hijackings, but the FBI found his name and phone number on a map in a car registered to one of the hijackers.

Abdi's attorney, Joseph Bowman, said his client doesn't know how his name ended up on the map and suggested Monday he might try to argue that the case should be handled by a state court, instead of federal prosecutors.

Abdi and Martinez-Flores are being detained without bond pending trial. Galicia has been released under a home detention program.

K-State rowing team fails to beat KU, win Sunflower Cup

BY JOEL REICHENBERGER
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State women's crew team took to the water Saturday hoping to knock off the University of Kansas and claim the Sunflower Cup for the first time in three years. But it was not to be, as the Jayhawks slipped away with a one-point advantage.

Saturday marked the fifth annual Sunflower Showdown at Tuttle Creek Reservoir. The teams came into the race with the series split 2-2 in the four previous competitions.

The Cats got off to a good start this year, winning the first race of the day — the third novice 8+, by nine seconds. The KSU-A boat finished far ahead of the KU boat and the KSU-B boat to earn K-State's first point of the regatta.

But, K-State's success was short-lived as the Jayhawks dominated the next stage of competition.

The Jayhawks won both of the next two races before meeting another strong Wildcat boat in the third varsity 4+. KU was in control the entire way, winning by 19 seconds, and in the second varsity 8+, KU got off to a fast start, widened its lead throughout the 2,000 meters and finished seven seconds ahead of the Cats.

In head-to-head meets like Saturday's, the winner of each race is awarded a certain number of points. The first varsity 8+ is the most important, with the winners receiving eight points, followed by the second varsity 8+ and the first novice 8+, each earning five points. The third varsity 4+ and the second novice 8+ offers three points, and the third novice 8+ awards one point.

It was in the fourth race of the day — the first novice 8+ — in which K-State lost any opportunity to gain an advantage and take home the Sunflower Cup. In a tight race in which the Jayhawks made two critical errors that slowed their boat, the Cats fell just two seconds short of victory.

After losing in the first novice 8+, K-State fought back and won the last two races of the day. The second novice 8+ was led by the K-State boat the entire way, and the Cats finished six seconds ahead of the Jayhawks. In the biggest race of the day, the Varsity 8+, the Cats again prevailed.

Both teams started with very high stroke rates and the two boats remained dead even through the first 500 meters. Finally, K-State pulled ahead for a short lead and was able to hold off a fierce KU sprint in the race's final moments to win by seven seconds.

Wins in the final two races gave K-State a total of 12 points, but the Jayhawks had already accumulated a 13-point lead by sweeping the middle races in the meet.

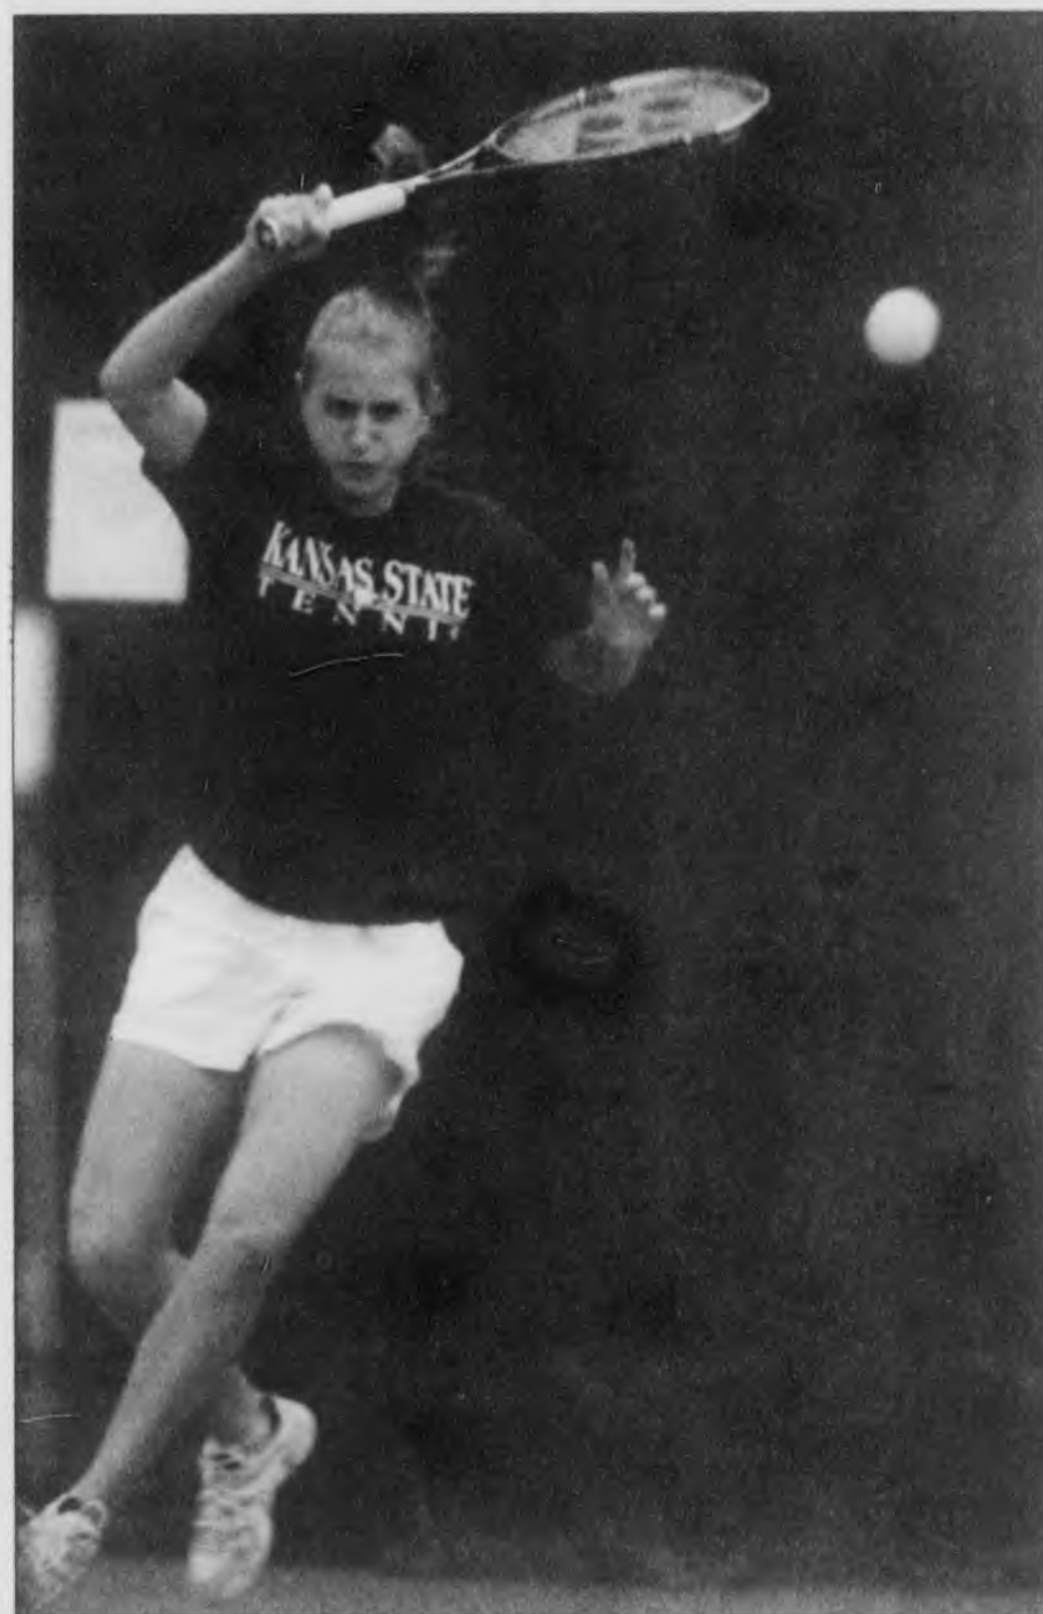

The loss marks the third straight year that the Cats have lost the Sunflower Cup to the Jayhawks. Head coach Jenny Hale said she was uncomfortable with the way

Wildcat tennis team strengthens play in home doubles tournament Saturday

BY LAURA BOYD
Kansas State Collegian

In their only home action of the fall, all three of K-State's doubles teams advanced to the final four, with one team taking second place in the 2001 K-State Wildcats Doubles Invitational last weekend.

"It was so exciting to make it to the final," freshman Maria Rosenberg said of her first home meet at K-State. "It is like the hard work is paying off."

The tournament brought twelve teams of opponents from Iowa State, Missouri, Colorado and Oklahoma State to Manhattan for two days of competition.

Play Saturday ended with success as K-State's No. 1 and No. 2 doubles teams swept their pools with three wins each. Dominating every aspect of the game, the No. 1 team of senior Alena Jecminkova and freshman Andrea Cooper earned wins over Iowa State, Colorado and Missouri. The No. 2 team of senior Kathy Chuda and junior Petra Sedlmajerova went 3-0 against Oklahoma State, Iowa State and Colorado.

K-State's No. 3 team of junior Paulina Castillejos and Rosenberg suffered just one loss Saturday to Missouri's regional championship team while defeating Iowa State and Oklahoma State and gaining enough points to play on Sunday.

"It was nice to get some wins at home," head coach Steve Bietau said. "I am extremely happy with the quality of play."

The true home-court excitement came Sunday when the pools were narrowed down to two sets to play in the semifinals. On one court was Oklahoma State's No. 1 team of Dominika Olszewska and Ashleigh Dolman against K-State's Sedlmajerova and Chuda. On the other court, two Wildcat pairs were pitted against each other. Seeding led to a match-up between Jecminkova/Cooper and Castillejos/Rosenberg. Castillejos and Rosenberg took the win in an 8-5 victory over their fellow Wildcats.

"It is not ever pleasant to play your teammates," Rosenberg said. "You just have to remember that on the court, they are not your teammate. They are your opponent."

Diamondback victory vindicates columnist's pre-series pick

Once upon a time, in the wonderful world of baseball, there was a squeaky-clean little team named the New York Yankees.

More than anything in the world, these boys wanted to win their fourth consecutive World Series title and establish themselves as a sweaty, money grubbing, arrogant dynasty.

What happened next, you ask?

Along came the big, bad Arizona Diamondbacks and kicked their Yankee asses back to the projects, that's what!

Who's your daddy, New York? Congratulations, Arizona. After that long haul of a whopping four years, you gained your championship title.

And what better way to do it than at the final second of Game 7, sending Joe Torre and his pack of mules running with their tails between their jock straps?

I haven't been this happy since I heard the equestrian team hired Lindsay Breindenthal — damn!

Allow me to toot my own horn. While everyone else was touting the Yanks before the first pitch of the series, clamoring about how much they deserved it, what Collegian columnist picked the D-Backs to take it all?

That's right. I did.

I'm not the only one who called it. I'm just the only one who matters.

And what a Fall Classic it certainly was. So many twists and turns, heroes and heartbreaks.

With the first two games quickly tucked under their belt, I stood fast, hoping Arizona would continue down that path and show New York a nice chunk of irony by sweeping them under the mat. I was talking trash left and right.

Then it got nasty. Losing three games in a row, the 'Backs seemed powerless against Don Zimmer, the Sta-Puft marshmallow man, and his boys from the city that never sleeps.

Roger Clemens was sticking his chest out, and Derek Jeter was strutting his stuff like Leon Phelps.

I, on the other hand, definitely had my foot in my mouth.

That snack didn't last long, however, as Arizona came charging out of the dugout in Game 6 and in one fell swoop spanked New York with a spread of 13 runs.

Oh, it hurts so good, doesn't it?

As if things couldn't possibly get better, Game 7 gloriously became one of the finest conclusions in World Series history.

With both teams battling it out neck and neck for a scoreless five and a half innings, I feared a slew of double digit innings ahead.

The knights of the pitcher's mound waged war, swinging their swords and throwing the heat until the top of the seventh when the game became tied at one run apiece.

Oh, the humanity of it all. I couldn't bear it.

Then, like a mighty kick to the groin, as the eighth inning was well under way for the Yankees, Arizona pitcher Curt Schilling gave up a run and the situation looked bleak.

I wouldn't admit it at the time, but I prophesied an imminent loss for my boys, and I almost broke out the ashes and sackcloth for a time of mourning.

Lakers, I mean Yankees, win another title, but I would have been out 20 bucks — and dude, I'm poor.

My wallet soon was relieved, however, during the bottom of the ninth.

With the game so close, what a fatal blow to New York it was when pitcher Mariano Rivera committed a costly error on the bunt from Damian Miller and the fire was fed for an Arizona comeback.

Like a god on Mount Olympus, Luis Gonzalez walked up to the plate and as thousands of camera flashes were fired he pummeled his RBI single into center field, ushering in the game winning run.

I am sure Rivera got his ass beat that night.

What an emotional conclusion to a heated game, the best Game 7 of my lifetime and some of the best baseball I have ever seen.

For the first time this year, this columnist had goosebumps.

This columnist was excited about sports.

FOOTBALL IN BRIEF

By Dan Smith

Tailback earns Big 12 Player of Week with record-setting day

K-State senior running back Josh Scobey was named the Big 12 Conference's Offensive Player of the Week on Monday.

Scobey, who also earned the honor with a personal-best 204 rushing yards last week against Kansas, becomes the second player this year to earn the award three times, along with Nebraska quarterback Eric Crouch.

The senior helped the Wildcats' bowl-eligibility chances by rushing for 172 yards on 32 carries in K-State's 42-3 pasting of Iowa State on Saturday in Ames, Iowa.

Scobey also was named the conference's offensive player of the week after a 27-carry, 165-yard game against Southern California on Sept. 8.

Colorado linebacker Drew Wahlroos and wide receiver Roman Hollowell were named the Conference's defensive and special teams players of the week, respectively in the Buffaloes' 38-24 win over Missouri on Saturday.

LOCAL TALENT

WHO: Dan Heinz, junior in theater

Heinz

Dan Heinz, junior in theater, plays the part of Deputy Governor Danforth in "The Crucible," which will be at 8 p.m. Thursday through Saturday in McCain Auditorium.

Heinz said his job basically is to scare people since his character is a judge in Salem, Mass., who uses logic to persecute alleged witches.

"He uses cold, hard logic to justify his ideas," he said. "The idea that this well-educated man could let this happen is frightening."

The challenge Heinz said he encountered in "The Crucible" is finding a way to keep people's attention during long monologues within the confines of a character who isn't as bombastic as other characters.

Heinz said he has always been a performer, starting as a class clown in grade school. He first got involved in drama his freshman year in high school and now has been in four main stage productions at K-State.

"The Crucible" is an interesting play because it has a strong message, Heinz said.

"I like the idea of doing something you know is going to hit people," he said. "It's not like 'Oh, I just saw a show.' It hits everyone in a different way, but it always has an effect."

The Cadence group performs in the K-State Student Union Courtyard during lunchtime last week.

A cappella group entertains with style; releases 1st album in 3-year history

BY BECKY FISCHER
Kansas State Collegian

Twelve K-State voices sang to a crowd of more than 53,000 people last year.

The voices belonged to members of the a cappella, doo-wop-based singing group, Cadence.

Cadence performed during halftime at last year's K-State/OU football game, which broke attendance records.

It was a defining moment for the group, said Scott Bahr, Cadence member and senior in mechanical engineering.

"We'd come a long way in just a couple of years to perform to that crowd," Bahr said. "It was exciting."

Jennifer Frazee, drum major for the K-State Marching Band and senior in elementary education, said she remembers the event.

"There were so many people," Frazee said. "Cadence performed really well. They added spice to the show."

Frazee said the group's sound is unique. "It's not just singing," she said. "It has a lot of energy, and it's really jazzy. I loved it."

Cadence is a small ensemble of singers from the K-State Men's Glee Club, said founding member Andy Dueringer, senior in mass communications.

"We do our own independent performances from the Glee Club," Dueringer said. "We have a separate setup and style."

The group's style has changed over the four years since its creation, Dueringer said.

"We've always had bass, baritone, first tenor and second tenor voice parts," he said, "but what we sing changes. Our material has become more difficult."

Difficulty has come from the decision to completely omit instrumental accompaniment, Dueringer said.

"This is the first year we're fully a cappella," he said. "In the past, we've relied on instruments from time to time. That can be a real safety net. We're really challenging ourselves."

The desire to challenge itself and work hard has resulted in the group's first compact disc, Dueringer said. Their 17-track CD was recorded last semester, and copies were received just three weeks ago.

"The music on it is varied," Dueringer said. "It's got a sacred song, a barbershop song, some doo-wop and some popular tunes," he said. "It's a good mix of music."

Releasing a CD was one of the things Dueringer said he wanted Cadence to achieve from the beginning. As a founder, he was inspired by an a cappella group from the University of Illinois and said he wanted to form a similar group at K-State.

"The group at Illinois had been around since the late '60s, and they had a few albums out," Dueringer said. "I wanted to start something like that."

In fall 1998, Dueringer and four others created Cadence.

"We've been going ever since," Dueringer said. "I'm glad there's been such interest in it."

Singers interested in joining the group try out at the beginning of every fall semester.

"Even current members need to try out," Dueringer said. "It prevents the guys from becoming complacent. I have to try out, and I'm the business manager. Annual tryouts keep the energy fresh."

This year's Cadence has representatives from every class at K-State, Dueringer said.

"Age doesn't matter," he said. "We've had freshmen beat out seniors. We're just looking for the most talented guys."

Bahr said he wanted to be a member of the talented group when, as a freshman, he saw Cadence perform at a Glee Club concert.

"I remember thinking, 'I'm going to be up on stage with them next year,'" Bahr said. "It just so happened to work out."

Bahr has since become an arranger of music for the group, he said.

"I take an original recording and arrange it so it's a cappella," Bahr said. "That involves changing instruments into vocal parts. It's challenging, but it's a lot of fun, too."

Almost anything is open for Bahr to work with, he said.

"I had a guy say he wanted to do 'Down on the Corner' by Creedence Clearwater Revival," Bahr said. "The variety of songs keeps things interesting."

With his graduation coming up in May, Bahr said he'll miss the group.

"I have a pretty heavy schedule, and what time Cadence takes away from that can cause stress," he said. "But Cadence is also what relieves my stress the best. It will be the thing I miss the most."

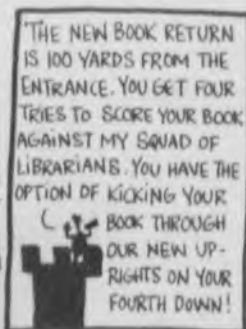

Dueringer said he'll also be graduating soon. "I hope to see Cadence continue," Dueringer said. "I'm the last original member, but there are some guys that are really inspired. It'll make it."

Scott Bahr, senior in mechanical engineering, sings with the group Cadence in the K-State Student Union Courtyard. Cadence recently released its first CD.

KU student government, officials trying to ban credit companies

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LAWRENCE, Kan. — Some University of Kansas students are trying to ban credit card companies from soliciting new customers on campus, claiming the plastic puts too many students deep in debt.

The Student Senate and school officials all would have to approve the ban. Similar bans already are in place at Fort Hays State University and Emporia State University.

"We're not trying to be people's parents here, but we don't think the university should sponsor or condone things that have been known to be harmful to students," University Student Body President Justin Mills said.

Mills said the credit card vendors — who set up tables on campus sidewalks and in buildings each semester to pitch their wares — annoy students.

But what's worse, Mills said, is that many students who have no income to pay their credit card bills end up owing lots of money.

Statistics show that 78 percent of college students have credit cards, and the average student has three with a debt of $2,900, said Heidi Simon, assistant director of student financial aid at the university.

"I think the problem is, the students are given the opportunity to have the cards before they're given the opportunity to learn about the cards," Simon said. "It's gotten a lot of students into deep trouble."

Chuck Stones, senior vice president of the Kansas Bankers Association, said students are adults and can decide for themselves if they want credit.

"As they go through life and sit around the dinner table, they're going to be solicited many, many, many times, over the phone and in the mail," Stones said. "If they don't want something, they need to learn to say 'no.'"

Resistance to the proposals also is coming from student organizations and the student union, which sponsors credit card sales, for a fee.

Mills said four proposals presented in the Senate range from banning on-campus solicitations of all kinds to requiring credit card companies to present educational materials about interest and credit ratings.

Mills said he hopes the Senate will adopt one of the plans by semester's end.

the Cats lost the meet.

"It is hard to win the Varsity B+ race and have the cup go away," she said.

She stressed that the team needs to remember that every boat counts, and that it is a team event.

"It is important for the team to remember that this dual series with KU is about team competition, about 'your' boat putting points on the board," she said.

Despite K-State's shortcoming, it was still an exciting day for women's crew. The first varsity B+ cruised to victory in their new boat, the Ida Conrow McGhee. Named after the oldest living K-State female letter-winner, 102-year-old Ida Conrow McGhee lettered in five sports while at K-State.

With a crowd gathered around, McGhee poured champagne over the bow of the victorious boat, dedicating it to her pioneering achievements in women's sports.

"We are here to pay homage for every role model she has set," said Hale. "She is our hero."

meant the last teams standing would be K-State's Castillejos and Rosenberg and Oklahoma State's Olszewska and Dolman.

"We went on the court knowing we had to do our best and fight for every point," Rosenberg said.

K-State struggled in the final games falling behind 6-1. After taking a breath, the Wildcats turned around to beat the Cowboys in the next game, in what looked like what could become a quick turnaround. Unfortunately, that was not the case. OSU came back to win the final two games and took the victory and the tournament with a final score of 8-2.

"They didn't show the maturity needed in the finals," Bietau said. "Overall, I was pleased with our doubles play and with the progress we have made."

The invitational was the last tournament for the Wildcats this fall. Bietau did not seem disappointed with the loss. The coach is optimistic about the spring season and said he thinks this team can do great things.

"We have got great depth on this team," Bietau said. "I am confident that anyone could step in at any time."

The Wildcats' new assistant coach Andres Gonzalez, said he also is excited about the progress the team has made this fall and its potential going into the spring.

"This weekend, I saw what we did in practice on the court, and it really made a difference," Gonzalez said.

The team will resume play Jan. 25 in Tucson, Ar., against Arizona, New Mexico and San Diego.

"We have to look forward to the spring," Bietau said. "They have shown that they have the confidence and ability to be extremely competitive."

"We just want to rip his head off and see who he is," said Amy Bergman, freshman in psychology, who was one of the first to attack Willie.

days. "This should deter some of the anxiety," Mayo microbiologist Franklin Cockerill said.

The test still is experimental, though some laboratories plan to begin using it next week.

On Capitol Hill, scores of lawmakers returned to their quarters in the Longworth House office building, closed 10 days ago. The building reopened Monday to all but the three House members whose offices were found to be contaminated.

Things were moving more slowly at the Senate Hart building, where the anthrax-filled letter to Majority Leader Tom Daschle was opened.

Officials had hoped to decontaminate the nine-story building by filling it with chlorine dioxide gas, an untested but promising method for cleanup. But government and private scientists who reviewed the plan worried that variations in humidity, temperature or the gas itself might prevent uniform performance.

It was unclear how the building eventually will be cleaned or when the 50 senators who work there will be able to return.

In New Jersey, Norma Wallace, released from the hospital Monday, said she believes she probably contracted anthrax when a co-worker shot compressed air into a jammed mail-processing machine and sent dust flying. She said it was Oct. 9 — the same day the Daschle letter was postmarked in New Jersey — when the machine jammed twice.

Three patients still are hospitalized with inhalation anthrax. One of them, a mail handler at the State Department, was released from an intensive care unit and has been improving steadily, State Department spokesman Richard Boucher said.

WAGES

to be spent on businesses that show economic promise if brought to Manhattan.

In February 2000, the Flint Hills Living Wage Coalition, at a commission work session, proposed that no money from the fund should be given to corporations unless they promise to pay their workers at least an $8.70 living wage along with modest vacation and sick leave benefits.

Janet Jackson, coalition coordinator, said members of the coalition believe that since this fund is for economic growth, the money needs to be trickling back down to where it needs to go — to the people who are struggling just to survive on the money they make working at a full-time job.

"Anyone who works 40 hours a week should be able to support a family," Jackson said.

"They should be able to provide a roof over their head and buy food and clothing for their family. That is not the case in Manhattan."

According to a recent K-State study, a single parent with two children needs to make at least $8.70 an hour, if insurance is included, to be able to purchase basic necessities, she said. Without insurance, a person needs $9.56 to survive in Manhattan.

"Because many people aren't making this much, they have to work two to three jobs to live, which causes a lot of individual stress. This puts stress on the family, which then puts stress on the entire community," she said. "People should understand that whenever we pay a living wage, we are contributing to a healthier community."

Commissioners never put the proposal on the agenda of a meeting when voting takes place. Jackson said the coalition still is working to make sure businesses that receive money from the fund pay their employees living wages.

She said asking Mercy to agree to their conditions not only would serve as economic justice, it would help provide a higher quality of health care.

"Many employees who are not physicians are unable to afford the Mercy health benefits package," she said. "We have health care workers who can't afford health care."

"In order to provide quality health care, we have to provide a fair wage. Without it, there is high turnover and low morale."

She said there has been a lot of communication between the hospital and the coalition. She has learned that they have increased their bottom wage from $6 to $6.80 recently, but she said they have not examined the benefits of the increase.

"We have received no indication from Mercy that they will voluntarily accept the stipulations of a living wage as a condition to receiving the million," she said. "Hopefully, the rally will get the community riled up, get the mood set and give everyone the information they need."

"Hopefully, they will understand why it is so important to make sure we stop the city from passing the proposal."

Federal Reserve cuts interest rates half point

BY MARTIN CRUTSINGER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Federal Reserve dropped a key interest rate to its lowest level on 40 years as it battled to prevent the heightened uncertainty following the terrorist attacks from sending the country into a deep recession.

The Fed on Tuesday slashed its federal funds rate, the key benchmark for overnight loans, by a half-point to 2 percent and signaled that it was prepared to continue cutting if conditions deteriorate further.

"The Fed is telling us they are really worried, and they will likely move again at their December meeting," said David Seiders, chief economist at the National Association of Home Builders.

Wall Street rallied on the news, given that investors had been split over whether the Fed would move by a half-point or a quarter-point. The Dow Jones Industrial average ended the day up 150.09 points at 9,591.12 after being down by 50 points just before the mid-afternoon Fed announcement.

The latest rate cut, the 10th this year, was taken against a backdrop of increasingly gloomy statistics indicating that the nation's longest economic expansion — more than a decade of uninterrupted growth — has ended.

The government reported last week that the gross domestic product declined at an annual rate of 0.4 percent in the July to September quarter. Many analysts believe the pace of the downturn will accelerate to a drop of 2 percent or more in the current quarter. A recession traditionally is defined as two consecutive quarters of falling GDP.

Job cuts in October totaled 415,000, the biggest one-month total in 21 years.

The concern is that the hundreds of thousands of job layoffs that have occurred since the Sept. 11 attacks will trigger a sharp reduction in consumer spending as more people become fearful of losing their own jobs, deepening and prolonging the recession.

The Fed's action, which pushed the funds rate down to its lowest point since September 1961, quickly was matched by commercial banks that reduced their prime lending rate by a half-point. The benchmark for millions of consumer and business loans was cut to 5 percent, its lowest level since June 1972.

"Heightened uncertainty and concerns about a deterioration in business conditions both here and abroad are damping economic activity," the Fed said in a four-paragraph statement.

The Fed repeated the phrase it employs when it wants to hold out the possibility of further rate cuts, saying that in the near future the risks are weighted mainly toward conditions that may generate economic weakness.

Many economists said the Fed very well could cut rates by another half-point at its last meeting of the year, Dec. 11. That would push the funds rate down to 1.5 percent, a level last seen in July 1961, when John F. Kennedy was president.

Some analysts are worried that plunging consumer confidence and the fears generated by the terrorist attacks and anthrax shipments in the mail will overwhelm the Fed's rate cuts.

KSU looks into tuition increase

BY SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

Continuous budget shortfalls could cause K-State's tuition to triple in the next five years.

"The state budget is in a quandary. There's been tax cuts. No increases," Sue Peterson, assistant to the president, said. "This is a huge positive opportunity for us."

As a result, administrators have drafted five different options regarding the increase.

■ A large increase, which would consist of a 27 percent increase each year for five years. It would position K-State in the top 10 in tuition among land-grant schools.

■ A 16.5 percent increase each year for five years, which would put K-State in the upper quarter in tuition among land-grant schools.

■ A 9.5 percent increase each year for five years, which would allow K-State to reach the median level.

■ A split structure, which would consist of a 5.5 percent increase each year for five years. It also would require students taking upper division courses to pay $20 more per credit hour than lower division courses. Students in the colleges of Business Administration and Engineering would pay $10 more per credit hour.

■ A minimal increase in line with inflation and changes in the cost of living. This is what K-State has historically done.

An additional $75 technology and equipment fee is included in all five proposals.

A tuition increase will go into effect for the 2002-2003 school year, officials say. It's just a matter of how much.

K-State's vision

The future and present of K-State and Manhattan will be outlined throughout the semester. Look for future stories in the Wednesday editions of the Collegian.

BARTENDING 101

Teaching the basics of pouring

BY RYAN DONAHUE
Kansas State Collegian

Tossing bottles high in the air, mixing drinks and living the life of a bartender were just some of the aspirations and dreams 20 eager students had Tuesday evening.

In a relatively quiet back room of Gilligan's Bar, Wade Phillips gave an informative class on how to be a bartender. Phillips is a co-owner of Gilligan's.

"I am graduating in May, and I wanted something to fall on until I get my feet on the ground," Renee Crist, senior in social work, said as Phillips asked everyone why they were there.

Crist said she wants to use her new knowledge of bartending to help get her the start-up cash she will need right out of college.

"I will be doing my practicum this summer and I am not sure how much it will pay. I figure this will be good as a second job," Crist said.

Another student in attendance said alcohol was just a passion for him.

For whatever reason people attended the class, the aspiration to tend bar brought them all together.

Bill and Vicky Dean own the Black Jack Hills recreation area in Manhattan, and attended to learn some tricks of the bartending trade.

"We came to see if there was something to see, something we could learn to save us a little money, to learn some new tricks," Bill Dean said.

Vicky Dean had a different intention.

"I came to pick their brain," she said.

The couple sat right up front next to the bar and fired one question after the other at Phillips. Bill Dean said it's not every day that he gets to go one-on-one with his competitors.

In the class, Phillips taught his apprentices some of the trade secrets of bartending — from the strong-topped drink, such as a gin and tonic, to ways of cutting off a customer without embarrassing them.

The bartending ethics also were discussed, as well as the higher order of liquor. From the bottom of the well to the top of the shelf, a bar can be ordered chaos to the trained eye.

"Keep going 'till you get it right," Phillips told one student as he attempted to pour his first professional drink.

"It is harder than you think," Jason Seymour, senior in mechanical engineering, said. "I like to throw around drinks at home. My roommate took the class and liked it. I wanted to be the only mechanical engineering bartender."

The class covered A's to Z's of drinking. Students in Free Enterprise sponsored the event at Gilligan's and supplied the class with a complete pamphlet of every common drink known in the Aggieville area.

The pamphlet was part of the $20 entry fee along with a free Budweiser T-shirt and the ability to question a bartender.

The class also covered and discussed the new and existing laws governing bars.

"Right now, there is a 30 percent food sales law, which means that 30 percent of our gross sales have to derive from food," Phillips said.

Phillips said he believes the law is a hindrance for some bars, but Gilligan's has little problem covering the minimum.

"Some bars in Manhattan don't even have kitchens," Phillips said. "Next year we will be trying to abolish the law."

Manhattan coalition group rallies to support living wage for Mercy

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Echoing throughout City Hall, Flint Hills Living Wage Coalition members chanted, "What do we want? A living wage. When do we want it? Now," minutes before the Manhattan City Commission meeting began Tuesday evening.

At the meeting, commissioners reviewed a proposal offering $1 million to the Mercy Health Foundation to fund the Mercy Health Center expansion.

Coalition members rallied to convince the commissioners to only allocate the money to Mercy if they required it to pay all of its employees at a living wage. According to the coalition, a living wage in Manhattan is $8.70 per hour.

Silencing the shouts, Mayor Bruce Sneed approached the group and walked through the wooden doors separating the protesters from the commissioners waiting for the 7 p.m. meeting.

"We hear you. We hear you," Sneed said. "I appreciate everyone coming out tonight. I know you feel strongly about this. I need you to work with me so everyone has an opportunity to speak."

About 75 people attended the rally, John Exdell, coalition chair, said.

"This shows good support and good organization," Exdell said.

He said he felt Manhattan residents supported the coalition's efforts and that the rally was successful.

"The community has been alerted and cares about the issue," he said.

Holding a handmade yellow sign that read, "Good Kansans Deserve Good Pay,"

John Reese, professor of entomology, said he always has favored a living wage.

"I don't think tax money should be given away to groups not paying their employees a living wage," Reese said. "It's closer to a decent wage than minimum wage, which is not adequate."

Another supporter, Jean Hulbert, worked in Memorial Hospital's lab for 20 years before it became Mercy Health Center. She said she examined firsthand the effects of low wages.

"I did know the working poor," Hulbert said. "They worked hard all day and still needed help with basic living."

"These weren't workers in the lab. These were the people in housekeeping and laundry."

She said the workers still deserved basic living wages.

"They were completely important to the overall functioning of the hospital," she said.

"There's not much use to having a hospital if you're not going to keep it clean."

Nikki Adams, senior in sociology, is the coalition's National Association for the Advancement of Colored People representative. She said she planned on speaking on the coalition's behalf during the commission meeting.

"What I want to focus on is, just like the civil rights movement, here is a living wage movement," Adams said. "A living wage gives citizens human dignity."

She grew up in a family of five with only one breadwinner, she said, so she understands what it is like to fight to survive.

"My mother worked so hard just to put food in our mouths," she said. "I know the impoverished conditions. I know what it's like to grow up with no health care, even with a full-time income."

She said many people who earn minimum wages make too much money to be eligible for public assistance. She said she is in support of making Mercy pay living wages to its employees because government money should make sure it is supporting its community.

"We have been giving public funds to private businesses," she said. "These private businesses are keeping the money instead of letting it trickle down to the lower-paying jobs."

Wichita high school will close for bacteria removal

WICHITA — Two educators have been diagnosed with a respiratory illness caused by exposure to the birds that flock around the high school where they work.

Northeast Magnet High School will close Thursday at 3 p.m. for a four-day cleaning, during which workers will vanquish any remaining pigeons and remove their droppings and feathers. The school will reopen Tuesday after the Veterans Day holiday.

Science teacher Jean Lake-Brown and guidance counselor Victoria Jackson were diagnosed with pigeon fancier's disease this fall.

"We are now being told we can never go back in the building, and I have to be careful for the rest of my life," Lake-Brown said.

The disease, which is sometimes called pigeon lung, is an allergic reaction to bacteria in the droppings.

Dodge City commissioners ban nudity in public places

DODGE CITY — Commissioners have approved an ordinance banning nudity in public places in an effort to regulate adult entertainment.

The Dodge City Commission voted unanimously Monday to adopt the ban, which is modeled after a similar law in Wichita. Violators would face up to a year in jail and a $2,500 fine.

Exceptions were made for certain artistic endeavors, such as nude modeling for art classes or a theatrical production with what the ordinance calls "serious literary, artistic, scientific or political value."

Commissioners first started debating whether to ban public nudity in August.

"The response was that we didn't really feel we had a serious problem; however, the intent was to regulate this industry before problems might occur," city manager John Deardoff said in an Oct. 31 memo to the city commission.

Former superintendant guilty of credit card fraud

HAYSVILLE — The former Haysville superintendant has pleaded no contest to charging thousands of dollars in personal expenses to a school district credit card.

The district attorney's office will recommend probation, restitution and community service for Lynn Stevens, though Judge Tom Malone will not be bound to that recommendation at the Dec. 12 sentencing. Stevens waived his right to a trial by entering the no contest plea Monday.

Over the past three years, Stevens charged as much as $16,000 a month for everything from car washes and chocolates to hotel rooms and airline tickets. Some of the expenses were for travel to educational conferences.

It has not been determined how much Stevens should reimburse the district for the questionable charges on his district-issued American Express card.

Verizon, U.S. government negotiating phone deal

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Verizon Wireless and the government are in the final stages of a deal that would give some emergency officials priority access to the company's cellular network, according to federal officials.

The system, intended to be used only in times of crisis, would be operating in New York, Washington and Salt Lake City, the site of the 2002 Winter Olympics.

Verizon has submitted a request to the Federal Communications Commission, which must review and approve some elements of the plan. In a statement Monday, Verizon acknowledged the deal, but said it is not yet final.

Under the agreement, about 2,000 federal, state and local officials would be given a code that allows them priority over other people trying to make calls, according to a government official who spoke on condition of anonymity.

International airlines to turn over passenger lists

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Five more international airlines, including Egypt Air and Kuwait Airways, have agreed voluntarily to turn over to the U.S. Customs Service advance lists of passengers to screen for possible terrorists.

Under the announcement made by the Customs Service on Tuesday, the five airlines would join a host of other carriers that voluntarily provide such information to the agency.

At this time, however, only one of the five airlines — the German airline Lufthansa based in Düsseldorf — is capable of actually transmitting the passenger information to Customs.

The four other airlines have agreed to develop systems to do this, Customs said.

The Customs Service currently has access to about 85 percent of international flight passenger information under the voluntary program with the airlines.

Student wins $1,000 for local chapter of AATC

Kelly Veatch

senior in textile science

Kelly Veatch, senior in textile science, recently received first place at the American Association for Textile Chemist and Colorist student paper competition in Greenville, S.C.

The title of Veatch's presentation was "Effects of Light Exposure on the Ultraviolet Protection of Direct, Reactive, Acid and Disperse Dyes on Cotton and Nylon Fabrics."

The competition was based upon the quality of the written manuscript and an oral presentation of the student's research. Veatch said about 60 percent of the presentation was written and 40 percent of the presentation was oral.

Veatch said she was surprised when she won.

"I was shocked," she said. "Only four undergraduates had done the competition, and I was the last person to present my research. I'm extremely excited that I won."

By winning the competition, Veatch earned the student chapter of AATC at K-State $1,000, and her paper will be published in the AATC Review.

Barbara Gatewood, professor of apparel textiles and interior design, who served as Veatch's adviser for the project also has supervised three other award-winning projects.

Pepsi sales down; campus ties solid

BY LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

Pepsi Cola has reigned as the sole soda vendor on campus now for about a year and a half.

Tom Schellhardt, associate vice president of administration and finance, said the sales for the first year have almost been on target.

"So much revenue was projected, but we ended up being close enough to reaching that goal," he said.

K-State and Pepsi fell a few thousand short of the estimate — $335,000 a year in commission revenue.

Revenue estimates had fallen short because they were based on the number of vendor placements — the locations of beverage machines. Dan Wassenberg, president of Pepsi Co. Inc. in Marysville, Kan., said steps to correct the shortfall have been taken.

The steps to correct the shortfall included adjustments made for beverage machine locations and determinations for what things to do with marketing, but overall, Schellhardt said he has been pleased with Pepsi.

"I think they would say the same also," he said. "The interaction with the Pepsi family, and the cooperation on both sides has been good."

K-State signed a contract agreement with the Pepsi Bottling Company of Marysville on Nov. 4, 1999, giving Pepsi exclusive rights to beverages on campus for the next 10 years.

Pepsi won over Coca-Cola because it made the best proposal. The contract took effect January 2000.

The $12 million contract will give Hale Library $5 million, $2.3 to a scholarship program, $500,000 to marketing and promotions and $2 million to the K-State Student Union during the next 10 years.

The deal included $1 million up front, and a moratorium on prices was set at $1 for a 20-ounce bottle for the next 3 years.

Pepsi wrote the first check for $1 million to Hale Library on July 17, 2000.

Schellhardt said working with Pepsi Cola in Marysville has been very successful.

"They have been most flexible and cooperative to work with," he said.

Wassenberg said the deal has been great so far for Pepsi, and the people they have worked with at K-State have been wonderful.

"We hope this is a potentially forever deal," he said.

Wassenberg said Pepsi sees all its customers as a customer for life.

"We hope our services and products have lived up to K-State's expectations and that we have been meeting their standards," he said.

"I have no doubt, though, that the relationship will continue to stay strong."

City Commission approves 5-year funding for Mercy Health Center improvements, wages

BY MICHAEL WATSON
Kansas State Collegian

The City Commission approved $1 million over five years for Mercy Health Center improvements Tuesday.

Mayor Bruce Snead said it is important to spend Manhattan Economic Development Opportunity Fund Advisory Board Funds on health care.

"This really is a quality of life investment — an infrastructure investment — and a long term investment," he said. "You don't do that without spending a lot of money."

Members of the Flint Hills Living Wage Coalition asked the commissioners to table the motion in order to attain higher wages for Mercy Health Center employees.

John Exdell, Flint Hills Living Coalition Chair, said Mercy wages are too low. He recommended that the commission reject the motion for funds.

"Living wages are a matter of basic justice," he said. "People that are working to contribute to society should not suffer."

Snead said he thinks it is hard to bite the bullet and spend the money on the hospital, but health care needs to be supported.

Commissioner Mark Taussig said he thinks spending $200,000 more than five years makes good economic sense.

The improvements will create jobs, he said. It also spins off to the retirement community, and better health care for everybody.

"The community has generally supported health care in Manhattan," he said. "We recognize how important that is in the community — to have good health care."

The allocation of funds to Mercy Health Center does not eliminate all MEDOFAB funds. There will be $160,000 left in the fund, and that will grow each year by $90,000 to $100,000.

"This fund will continue. Economic development will continue. We just won't have all the funds," Snead said.

Education about tuition increases vital in forming valid opinions

The price of education at K-State might change more quickly than we realize. According to administrators, increases might come as soon as next year.

With finances as tight as they are for students, it is easy to assume no one wants to pay more for education.

But as much as K-State is a university, in many respects it also is a business just trying to put out the best product for the best price. While the school annually receives more than $50 million from tuition, this isn't enough. Just look at teachers' salaries.

At this stage in the game, certainties about how the tuition increase will be implemented still are shaky. The lines have not been drawn. The administration is trying to sketch in the details.

While nothing is set in stone, it is important now more than ever for students to learn about this issue. It is easy to simply say that the increase is not wanted, but it is vital to examine why the university is asking for the increase.

There will be an open forum for students from 3 to 5 p.m. Dec. 6 in the Hemisphere Room of Hale Library. The administration is seeking an opinion on the issues of tuition and university finances. Educate yourself, then go voice your opinion. After all, this funding will come from your checkbooks.

Outdated cousin marriage laws create injustice

Last week I wrote my column in support of President Bush. This week's columns continues the trend of columns I never thought I'd write.

Today I'm arguing against cousin marriage laws. That's right. I think laws that prohibit first cousins from marrying are outdated and should be changed.

Dr. Martin Ottenheimer, professor of anthropology, changed my thinking on this topic. He is an expert in the field of cousin marriage and was kind enough to share his extensive research findings with me.

The most interesting thing I learned was cousins who marry do not have an increased chance of having deformed or mentally disabled children. My high school biology teacher was the first to teach me this myth. He reasoned that genetics explained these deformities. But, as Ottenheimer says, "Doctors and biologists aren't geneticists."

The truth is, genetics never have had anything to do with preventing cousins from marrying. The idea first originated in the Roman Catholic Church around the fourth century. Then (and still today) the church believed that cousins who married violated the sanctity of the family.

Marriage between cousins was prohibited for different reasons during the emergence of evolutionary theory in Europe. At that time, it was thought to be civilized was to behave differently from animals. Since animals procreate with their relatives, it was believed only uncivilized humans married their family members, cousins included.

John V. Graham

Interestingly, the image of being civilized was the whole reason why Kansas was the first state to have anti-cousin marriage laws in 1861. We wanted to portray an image other than one of savageness and lawlessness. Preventing cousins from marrying was one attempt to extinguish our uncivilized appearance.

To sum up, cousin marriage laws were made for us to look civilized. They don't have anything to do with genetics.

So, now we all know cousins do not have an increased chance of having disabled children. Still, there remains a lingering ickiness to the whole idea. This remaining feeling causes most of us to have an emotional reaction against allowing cousins to marry.

This feeling happens because part of how we define ourselves as human beings is we don't marry our relatives. It is an unconscious reaction that must be overcome if we want to approach this issue objectively.

So, now that we've established that it's OK for cousins to marry, even though we might feel uncomfortable with the idea, why else should we rewrite these laws?

Well, one problem with having these laws is they lure people into falsely believing that we're reducing the number of genetically deformed children in our society. I've shown you they don't. If people really want laws that will reduce the number of genetically deformed children, then we should replace cousin marriage laws with genetic counseling.

In genetic counseling, couples find out if they're genetically compatible, so to speak. A geneticist will tell them their odds for having children free of genetic defects. In this way couples have accurate information before they obtain a marriage license.

Another reason to change this legislation is that some cousin couples desperately want to get married. There is a couple in Kansas with this dilemma. They've fallen in love, and one has been diagnosed with a life-threatening disease. They want to do the right thing and marry each other, but this law prevents them.

Many of you reading this column are thinking you never would marry your cousin. It might be against your religious beliefs, or maybe you just wouldn't feel comfortable doing it. That's OK.

But realize there are some cousin couples that don't share your beliefs or discomfort. The only thing that's holding them back is a silly, outdated law. Don't you think it's time we fix this injustice by doing away with this law?

Attacks must teach lessons, not cease living

When I close my eyes, sometimes I see them. Men, wearing business suits, their legs and arms waving in despair, as they fall to their certain deaths. I remember trying to tell myself to turn the channel. I couldn't. Now these images haunt me.

I've tried to do what President Bush has asked, to go on with my life as normal and also practice extreme caution.

But all I can feel is guilt. Guilt in the sense that I am trying to go on with my life when others had theirs taken from them. For a while, this feeling of guilt made me want to be alone. This personal solitary confinement was not beneficial. The guilt drove me to push away the people I needed the most.

Psychologist Bill Crawford rationalized these feelings in the Sunday issue of The Kansas City Star. Crawford said those who feel guilty about enjoying themselves in this time of tragedy might be creating more anxiety in their lives. He asserted this guilt can cause stress and anger. He said we need positive emotions to help us cope in these times.

In the recent edition of USA Weekend, Dr. Drew Pinsky said connecting with others is essential right now. He wrote, "No matter how painful and difficult it is to connect with others, you need to do it. Humans need each other in order to manage and be healthy in situations like this."

Now, more than ever, people need to be together.

It is difficult to move on when there are so many reminders — when we know others have been through hell. But life goes on, even though it will never be the same.

Our country went to sleep Sept. 10 and woke up to a nightmare that hasn't ended yet. So many things have changed since that chaotic day in September.

It is not hard to see these differences. The differences can be found in the economic slump that has made December graduates scramble for jobs. It has made all people cautious, from opening their mail to taking their children out for Halloween.

But some positive differences can be seen in the strong sense of American pride displayed by people of all ages, companies and local governments.

Things once deemed important no longer are. Although assignments and tests still are sources of stress, they are not essential when all is said and done. They are mere specks in the makeup of everything.

It is important for everyone to take time to reflect on the misery our country has endured and note the strength that has formed as a result.

Remember to take time to appreciate the lessons the Sept. 11 tragedies have taught us.

And while it nearly is impossible for life to be the same, it will go on. It must. It must go on with an acceptance of the courage it takes to overcome what our nation is dealing with. With that also must be the realization that the terrorists already have taken so much, and we should refuse for them to take anything more.

Even though the images still are fresh in our minds and the wounds on our hearts are not yet healed, we should refuse to live in fear. When we live in fear, we are not really living.

Dr. Herbert Fensterheim said, "The question is not whether you're frightened or not, but whether you or the fear is in control. If you say, 'I won't be frightened,' and then you experience fear, most likely you'll succumb to it, because you're paying attention to it."

"The correct thing to tell yourself is, 'If I do get frightened, I will stay in command.'"

Ashcroft refutes assisted-suicide laws

BY KATHERINE PFLEGER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Attorney General John Ashcroft directed federal drug agents to take action against doctors who help terminally ill patients die, a move aimed at undercutting Oregon's unique assisted-suicide law.

The decision, outlined in a letter sent Tuesday to Drug Enforcement Administration chief Asa Hutchinson, allows the revocation of drug prescription licenses of doctors who participate in an assisted suicide using a federally controlled substance. However, it does not authorize criminal prosecution.

Ashcroft's order reverses a June 1998 declaration by his predecessor, Janet Reno, who barred agents from moving against doctors who use Oregon's law.

Ashcroft said assisted suicide is not a legitimate medical purpose for prescribing, dispensing or administering federally controlled substances.

However, he said pain management is a valid medical use of controlled substances.

Religious groups and anti-abortion organizations hailed the move by Ashcroft, whose nomination as attorney general nearly was scuttled by critics who said his strong conservative views would cloud his judgment.

The National Right to Life Committee said the decision ensures that doctors in all 50 states legally cannot prescribe lethal doses of federally controlled drugs.

But Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., a strong proponent of the assisted-suicide law, said Ashcroft's order "is undoing Oregon's popular will in the most undemocratic manner possible. Americans in every corner of the nation are going to suffer needlessly."

Kevin Neely, spokesman for the Oregon attorney general's office, said the state will file motions in U.S. District Court in Portland on Wednesday seeking to head off Ashcroft's order.

Ashcroft based his decision on a unanimous Supreme Court ruling in May that said there is no exception in federal drug laws for the medical use of marijuana to ease pain from cancer, AIDS and other illnesses.

The court didn't change state laws allowing patients to use marijuana for medical reasons, but made the drug harder to obtain by denying patients the right to claim medical necessity as a reason to circumvent a 1970 law regulating controlled substances.

Under Oregon's Death With Dignity Act, doctors may provide — but not administer — a lethal prescription to terminally ill adult state residents.

It requires that two doctors agree the patient has less than six months to live, has voluntarily chosen to die and is able to make health care decisions.

At least 70 terminally ill people have ended their lives since the law took effect in 1997, according to the Oregon Health Division.

All have done so with a federally controlled substance such as a barbiturate.

Advocates for the Oregon law are worried Ashcroft's decision will make doctors less likely to prescribe large amounts of medication to those who need it out of fear the patient could die and the physician's license be taken.

"The federal government has way overstepped its boundaries and has undermined good health care practices across the country, not just in Oregon," said Scott Swenson, executive director of Oregon Death With Dignity. "What they have done is to federalize medicine."

When Reno issued her order in 1998, she said she found no evidence the Controlled Substances Act was intended to displace states as the primary regulators of the medical profession or override a state's authority of what constitutes a legitimate medical practice.

Since then, conservative, religious and pro-life groups have mounted a campaign to try to block the Oregon law. Sen. Don Nickles, R-Okla., pushed a bill last session that would have done what Ashcroft ordered, but the measure never reached the floor for a vote.

Oregon voters twice approved physician-assisted suicide in referendums during the 1990s.

The Supreme Court in June 1997 upheld bans on assisted suicide in New York and Washington state, but left it up to states to decide whether to allow the practice.

FBI concludes bridge alert lacks credibility, urges nation to be cautious

BY KAREN GULLO
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The FBI concluded Tuesday that the raw intelligence behind last week's warning that terrorists might attack West Coast bridges was not credible.

Nonetheless, the FBI wants law enforcement to remain on high alert and guard against possible terrorist activities in the United States and abroad, officials said.

The FBI received uncorroborated intelligence last week suggesting terrorists might strike suspension bridges on the West Coast between last Friday and Wednesday and issued a private warning to law enforcement in eight states.

California Gov. Gray Davis then took the information public, suggesting federal officials had credible evidence of a possible terror attack on four bridges in his state.

National Guard troops took up positions on the bridges, and transportation officials beefed up security from the Golden Gate Bridge in San Francisco to the Holland Tunnel in New York.

But agents who looked further into the raw intelligence found no evidence to corroborate the threat, officials said. They issued an updated message to police nationwide Tuesday.

"Recipients should be advised that FBI investigation has determined that the threat to suspension bridges is not deemed credible," the message said.

The reassessment came as a top FBI official acknowledged agents still have few clues in the investigation into anthrax attacks that have left four dead and sickened 13 more Americans.

FBI counterterrorism official James Caruso told a Senate Judiciary subcommittee hearing federal law enforcement officials still don't know the number of U.S. labs that handle anthrax or other biological agents.

In Nevada, a federal judge on Tuesday ordered a U.S. Consulate employee from Saudi Arabia sent to New Jersey to face charges he accepted bribes to grant visas to foreigners entering the United States.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Howard Zlotnik told U.S. Magistrate Robert Johnston that the FBI has recorded and videotaped evidence that the consulate employee, Abdulla Noman, arranged the sale of visas to people entering the United States from Saudi Arabia.

He said the Yemeni citizen needed to be held until authorities learn more about how several Saudi citizens involved in the Sept. 11 hijackings obtained their visas.

"He was the go-to man for people getting false visas in Saudi Arabia," Zlotnik said. "It's no secret that the individuals on Sept. 11 came from Saudi Arabia with visas."

"The nature of that crime clearly poses a risk to the community until the FBI investigates who he provided visas to."

A lawyer representing Noman told Johnston that Noman was beaten in his cell Monday while in custody of the U.S. Marshall's Service in Las Vegas.

"He was beaten because he was an Arab," said Shari Kaufman, an assistant federal public defender in Las Vegas. She pointed to cuts and bruises on Noman's face and said he was beaten by another inmate.

Kaufman said Noman was a trusted U.S. Consulate employee in Jeddah, Saudi Arabia who has been wrongly accused and detained because of anti-Arab fear in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks.

Cats look to secure NCAA bid in Austin

BY SEAN PURCELL
Kansas State Collegian

Every team hopes to be playing its best when it counts the most, and that notion couldn't apply more than it does to the Wildcat volleyball team tonight in Austin, Texas.

With just five matches remaining before postseason play begins, K-State looks to gain enough convincing wins to make a case for a return trip to the NCAA tournament.

"These five matches we have remaining the next three weeks may define our entire season," head coach Suzie Fritz said. "It's a critical stretch in terms of seeding for the NCAA tournament and putting ourselves in a position to go deep into post season play."

K-State made it to the Sweet 16 in last year's tournament, but the team has aspirations of going even this year.

But to accomplish that goal, the Wildcats first will have to make it through some of the top teams in the Big 12. K-State's first test will come against the Texas Longhorns, a team the Wildcats defeated earlier this season at Ahearn Field House. Now, K-State will make the trip to Austin, hoping to relay an even more convincing argument to the selection committee.

The team is capable of making that kind of statement, Fritz said, because of the improvement it has shown since playing Texas just more than a month ago.

"We are a better team than a month ago, and that is what is important," Fritz said. "We are just going to take it one match at a time because that has been our philosophy the whole time. And if we do that, we will pick them off one by one."

K-State's biggest challenge has been to play consistent volleyball on the road. The Wildcats have been able to find a rhythm as of late, Fritz said, and they need to keep that same mentality against the Longhorns tonight.

"We have been playing better on the road," Fritz said. "Early in the season, we weren't as satisfied with where we were in terms of going on the road and being in someone else's gym. But in our last couple of matches on the road, we have been real pleased with our team's performance and how well they have adapted to being on the road."

Another weapon in the Wildcats' arsenal is K-State's strong bench play. One player who has led K-State recently is sophomore Cari Jensen. Fritz said she has been able to see in practice those players who she feels can be called upon to step up at any point in a match.

"We compete for positions every day in practice, so our players are always battling," Fritz said. "Competition within our gym has created a good environment for our players, and who we play is dictated by who puts up the best numbers at that time."

Jensen has been the player who has continued to put up those kinds of numbers for the Wildcats. The 6-foot outside hitter from Fowler, Colo., scored double-doubles in each of last week's matches and added three service aces in the three-set win over Kansas on Halloween.

Jensen named Conference Player of the Week

BY DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Outside hitter Cari Jensen was named the Big 12 Volleyball Player of the Week on Monday afternoon after leading K-State to two shutout victories over conference foes Kansas and Iowa State last week.

The sophomore led the Wildcats by tallying back-to-back double-doubles against the Jayhawks and Cyclones after earning a starting role ahead of K-State standouts Liz Wegner, Lisa Mimick and Jenny Pollard.

"Cari really came up big for us last week with two impressive matches," head coach Suzie Fritz said.

"She has been held behind two seniors and a junior for much of the season who have a little more experience than her, but she has been playing well in practice the last few weeks, and we decided that she had earned the opportunity to start for us."

Already described as a valuable resource off the bench for the Cats, Jensen had averaged 2.72 kills and 1.64 digs a game in limited action behind Wegner and Pollard.

But given the chance to shine as a starter, Jensen shined last week, beginning with an impressive outing in Lawrence on Wednesday night.

The sophomore recorded 12 kills and 12 digs in her first start of the season

Junior outside hitter Jenny Pollard celebrates with teammates after K-State defeated Iowa State 3-0 on Saturday night at Ahearn Field House.

"Cari earned the opportunity to get some playing time, and she took advantage of it," Fritz said.

"It is good to know you can call on a player to step it up, and that says a lot about our team."

Whoever is on the floor for the Wildcats tonight will have to be ready for the big hitters Texas brings to the court, Fritz said. One of those sensations is freshman Mira Topic. K-State has been able to defend the strong side hitters lately, but the Wildcats will have to be even more ready to defend when the big hits come against the Longhorns.

"They are a very young and unpredictable volleyball team," Fritz said, "so being patient defensively may be the most important thing because they are going to throw it to the moon, and we are going to have to be ready for it."

against the Jayhawks. Jensen also added three service aces as K-State extended its streak to 14 straight over Kansas.

Against Iowa State on Saturday, Jensen posted her 13th career double-double by turning in a 19-kill, 10-dig performance in the Cats' shutout of the Cyclones.

Jensen is the first Wildcat to be honored as the Big 12 Player of the Week this season and the first since Wegner earned the honor Nov. 20 last year.

It also marks the second time Jensen has received the distinction after being named Co-Player of the Week on Oct. 30, 2000.

Game of baseball healthy despite funding issues

It's transition time in the world of sports this week. The baseball season ended with the Arizona Diamondbacks' improbable comeback Sunday night against the best relief pitcher in World Series history, Mariano Rivera.

After watching this exciting Series, I place only the college basketball tournament ahead of the baseball playoffs in terms of excitement.

First things first, baseball is OK. All you read in the papers is how teams are losing money, free agency is killing the game and the possibility of removing teams from the league is imminent. I disagree.

Sure, the Montreal Expos don't make any money and draw less than some intramural football games I've seen, but that's the league's fault for putting a team in a place like Montreal. In any league, not everybody can win. There always will be teams that get their heads kicked in. That's the nature of sports.

The issue of salaries always surfaces around playoff time. The Yankees are the team everyone loves to bash because they have the biggest payroll in baseball.

They have acquired many of the star players by giving big free agent contracts or via trades with teams that can't afford to pay the players' salaries. I admit they are guilty of that.

However, every team in the Major League does that. How do you think the Diamondbacks got Randy Johnson and Curt Schilling? I guarantee those two didn't end up in Arizona because of the great 110 degree weather or the pool in the outfield. Heck, Schilling was born in Alaska.

They are there because of the big money they're getting. That is why I laugh when uninformed people tell me how the Yankees bought their World Series titles. When people tell me this, I know whomever I'm speaking to doesn't know too much about sports. Spending a lot of money doesn't guarantee anything. If all you need is money to win a title, tell me why the Red Sox, Rangers and Dodgers can't even make it to a World Series.

A thing people always overlook is that

Women's team begins season tonight with exhibition contest

K-State's revamped women's basketball team will see its first action of the year tonight at Bramlage Coliseum against the Houston Jaguars (0-2), an eight-member team of former Division I and Division II players.

The Wildcats (0-0) will be unveiling a new look tonight with the help of five newcomers, including WBCA High School All-American Kendra Wecker, USA Today South Dakota Player of the Year Megan Mahoney and USA Today North Dakota Player of the Year Kari Hanson, all of whom are expected to start K-State's first exhibition contest.

Beyond the newcomers, the Wildcats also return three starters including the team's top scorer, sophomore Nicole Ohlde; three-point shooter, senior Kristin Rethman; and assist leader, senior Shalonda Booker in 2001.

contest against the Cats as well. Highlighting the roster is 2001 first-team all-Big 12 selection Amanda Lassiter, who returns to Bramlage after playing two years with the Missouri Tigers. Lassiter was drafted by the WNBA's Houston Comets after finishing her time with the Tigers last season. She averaged 4.3 points and 3.4 rebounds per contest with the Comets.

The other link to the conference is the Jaguar's 84-72 loss to the Iowa State Cyclones on Nov. 4. The exhibition team was led by Lassiter's 17-point performance, but four double-double games from the Cyclones helped Iowa State to improve to 1-0 in its exhibition slate.

Multi-faceted Nebraska poses challenge for KSU

BY DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's defense might hear the term "assignment sound" all too often from its coaches, but with the Nebraska game looming Saturday, it's been more like a broken record.

Linebacker Terry Pierce can vouch for that.

He said defensive coordinator Phil Bennett and staff might have emphasized assignment football all season — but NU week has its share of exceptions.

"They'll bust it," Pierce said of the Cornhusker offense, "because they've got somebody assigned for everybody. It's not one of those deals where they leave somebody unblocked on the backside. They're cutting everybody on the backside, they're bringing somebody up to the safety, and almost every play, it's going to be one guy that's supposed to be there to make the tackle.

"And if that one guy misses it, or you don't have the rest of the defense hustling, they can take it to the house every time."

Head coach Bill Snyder said missed assignments hurt any defense, but against second-ranked Nebraska, they could cost the Cats the game.

K-State will face a Husker offense averaging 38.2 points per game and a Big

WITCH HUNT

Play questions political actions, fears of society over time

BY JJ DUNCAN

Kansas State Collegian

Teen-age girls drinking blood and dancing in the woods isn't just a wild Saturday night. In "The Crucible," it sets a whole village of people against each other.

Taking on the Arthur Miller classic, K-State Theater will present "The Crucible" this weekend. The play is one of the most highly regarded pieces by an American, and director Charlotte MacFarland, associate professor of theater, said it takes on what people will do when they are afraid.

"I've been telling my cast that the opposite of love is not hate, but fear," she said. "The people in this play lived in a very suspicious and very afraid society. This play asks, 'What will we do out of fear?'"

The play was written during the Joseph McCarthy era, when many people active in show business were being listed as communists, including Arthur Miller. The play indirectly attacks the search for communists as a type of witch hunt. Those involved with the original production cared so much about the political message that they accepted half of their salary to keep the play on the stage, MacFarland said.

Since the Sept. 11 attacks, MacFarland said the message takes on special meaning because many Americans have failed to realize the danger of creating a witch hunt for those responsible for the terrorism.

"The play resonates differently now because as a society, we are dealing with evil on many different levels," she said.

The message of "The Crucible" is very important, so MacFarland said she is careful to stay true to Miller's original intent.

To stay true to the time period in which the play is set in, MacFarland said the costumes were designed carefully by Dana Pinkston, associate professor of theater. Instead of having plain black pilgrim costumes like many productions of "The Crucible," MacFarland said Pinkston found out how the colonizing Puritans actually dressed.

"The black and white costumes are inaccurate, even though that's how most productions do it," MacFarland said. "The pilgrims actually used mostly colors they could get from nature like greens and reds."

"Black is the only color they couldn't get from nature, so only wealthy wore black because it had to be imported from Europe."

Rebekah Dryden, senior in theater, plays Abigail Williams. She said Pinkston's work has helped a great deal. The costumes, even the parts that are hard to wear, bring the show together in a more realistic way, she said.

"Some of us are still getting used to the corsets," she said.

"I hadn't worn a full corset before, so it's a different experience."

The part of Abigail is a stretch for Dryden's abilities because she often plays the roles of sweet girls, she said, but this time she is the catalyst for everything that happens. Still, Dryden said she doesn't think of Abigail as bad.

"Most people think Abigail is an evil person, but I can't think of her that way as an actress, or else it would seem fake," she said. "She's had a horrible past, and she's living in a repressive environment and society. So I think about that as a reference point."

"The environment is so repressed that it brings out all these crazy and bad things."

Some of the bad things include several episodes of violence within the play, and Benaiah Anderson, junior in theater, coordinates the fights in the play. Anderson, who plays Francis Nurse, said he was surprised at how much physical violence is in the play. He coordinated about six different episodes.

Anderson said he has taken four courses in stage combat, and it is his job to create the illusion of violence while following steps to make sure things are safe.

"I coordinated a courtroom fight, which turns into a good-sized scuffle with several people involved," he said. "It's difficult sometimes to make things look realistic but keep it safe."

Art exhibition presents Kansas artists' postcard designs

BY BECKY FISCHER

Kansas State Collegian

Bigger isn't always better.

Postcards by the hundreds line the walls of the Manhattan Arts Center. These miniature pieces of art, created by Kansas residents, are on display until Sunday.

"To see a picture represented so minutely is absolutely delightful," Carole Chelz, gallery committee member, said. "There's a lot to see in these little cards."

Chelz said she was surprised to encounter such a large number of postcards for the exhibit.

"It took us a couple of weeks to hang the 600 postcards," Chelz said. "They're small, so they don't take up much room, but there are a bunch of them."

More than 600 postcards make up the total collection of 24 separate series. Every year since 1977, a new series of postcards is put together. Each has a total of 26 postcards from different local artists, Chelz said.

Postcards for each year's series are selected by the Salina-based Association of Community Arts Agencies of Kansas (ACAAK), Jolene Harrall, administrative assistant for ACAAK, said.

"Anyone who wants to submit a postcard, can," she said. "Some are made by high school students, while others are made by people who solely make money from being in the art world. Really, it's just the best art that's exhibited."

It's ACAAK's lack of registration limitations that allows for variety in the show, Harrall said.

"Our only requirements are that the person be a Kansas resident and that their work be a certain postcard size," Harrall said. "It leaves a lot of room for creativity."

And for competition.

"We have between 170 and 190 pieces entered every year," Harrall said. "It's a fun thing to do, so there are usually quite a few people interested."

Prizes, including cash, are an added incentive for artists to enter their work, Harrall said. Sixteen of the 26 selected receive $150 cash, along with 250 of their postcards and one set of the year's series. The other 10 receive $100 cash and the series' set.

"It's not a lot of money," Harrall said, "but it's fun to have your own postcards and to be part of a traveling show."

The first ACAAK director is responsible for the Kansas Postcards show, Harrall said.

"I believe she viewed a show like it in New York and was really impressed," she said. "She wanted Kansas to have something like it. It's continued for 24 years, so it's been pretty successful."

Lynda Andrus, associate professor of art, said she's been part of the show for multiple years.

"I entered for the first time several years ago and have been in four shows since then," Andrus said. "It's just a great opportunity to get your work out there. I've had people call me from different cities in Kansas to say they liked my postcard or that they'd be interested in showing my work."

Traveling shows are not something common in Kansas, Andrus said.

"A tremendous amount of work goes into these shows," she said. "It's really paid off. The show is great, and I'm glad to be a part of it again this year."

Sets of replicated postcards are available for $5 at the Manhattan Arts Center.

Only the current year's series is displayed throughout Kansas, Chelz said, while one gallery is selected to have opening ceremonies and to display the full collection of 600.

"We were excited to be selected this year," Chelz said. "There are so many postcards, we didn't have room for all of them. It's quite a thing to see."

"The Fed is trying to arrest the slide in the economy and in consumer confidence, but it may be running out of ammunition," said Sung Won Sohn, chief economist at Wells Fargo in Minneapolis.

Jerry Jasnowski, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, said that on top of all the other problems, his member companies are beginning to report increased trouble getting bank loans.

He said that, in the four weeks following the Sept. 11 attacks, loans to businesses declined at an annual rate of 20 percent.

"Under normal circumstances, the decision of banks to tighten credit in response to unprecedented losses would be understandable. But we are at war and a strong economy is essential to victory," Jasnowski said, calling on government regulators to convince banks to restore "sensible lending standards."

Many economists argued that the Fed's aggressive moves, along with the massive tax cut President Bush pushed through Congress last spring and an additional $100 billion in economic stimulus now being debated in Congress, should be enough to assure an end to the recession next year.

However, while many analysts had expected the rebound to occur in the first three months of next year, the recent string of bad statistics has caused some analysts to predict the recession will last into spring, with the unemployment rate, which shot up to 5.4 percent in October, topping 6 percent before the recovery begins.

Analysts believe the recession will not be worse than the 1990-91 downturn, which lasted nine months, although they cautioned that it could feel worse to many people given that unemployment had dropped to a 30-year low of 3.9 percent last year.

"While the data are unmistakably dismal, this is so far simply a normal recession," said Bill Chen, chief economist at John Hancock in Boston.

"There is every reason to think that vigorous monetary and fiscal stimulus will produce a vigorous recovery."

Hal Taylor is a K-State alumnus and a frequent patron of Aggieville. Taylor is enrolled as a third-year medical student at the University of Kansas and attended the event.

"Everyone is an amateur bartender. I wanted to do it for fun and to help pay for school," Taylor said.

There still are two more classes of Bartending 101. Students interested in attending a class can get more information at www.involvement.org.

"If there is enough interest in the event still, we will most likely put another class on in the spring," said Jennifer May, SIFE coordinator of the class.

"We did this as a sort of fundraiser. SIFE is not for profit, so any money made will just be reinvested in our other projects," May said.

Phillips finished his class with some good advice and a free beer for all his students over age 21.

"Never order a Cape Cod, just say vodka and cranberry. Remember, the blender is always broken after 11, and if you don't know what is in it, wing it," Phillips said.

Putin denies Russian involvement with anthrax, Iran weapons trade

BY BARRY SCHWEID
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Russian President Vladimir Putin insisted in an American television interview that Russia is not the source of anthrax spores circulating in the United States and said his country's smallpox supply is safe.

He also denied that Russia has provided dangerous weapons technology to Iran.

And he praised President Bush, with whom he will meet next week, as someone with whom he can do business and a leader who keeps his word.

In an interview in the Kremlin with Barbara Walters for ABC's "20/20" program, Putin struck a conciliatory stand on almost all fronts. He indicated, for instance, that he could be ready to strike a deal to clear the way for a U.S. anti-missile shield program.

"We could reach quite quickly mutual agreements," Putin said in an interview conducted on Monday and set to air on Wednesday. He added that the Russian position on a missile shield is quite flexible.

But he also cautioned that a settlement can only be found as a result of very intense negotiations.

Both Putin and Bush have said they would like to cut nuclear arsenals, which now number about 6,000 warheads for each country. The Russians have suggested cuts as low as 1,500; U.S. officials have discussed a range of between 1,750 and 2,250. In exchange, the U.S. would like to conduct missile tests now barred by a 1972 arms control treaty.

Asked if he is concerned that either anthrax or smallpox could be bought or stolen from a Russian source, Putin answered, "No. I believe it would be impossible."

The highly contagious and deadly smallpox virus was eradicated 21 years ago and is known to survive only in laboratories in the United States and Russia. Germ warfare experts suspect that other countries, including North Korea and Iraq, might have secretly obtained stocks.

Anthrax has been studied for years as a biological weapon with the potential weapon to sicken tens of thousands, including through a Soviet-era germ warfare program.

"Those materials have been guarded, were guarded in the Soviet Union, and Russia, very securely," Putin said. "So I exclude that possibility. I believe this is true of anthrax and smallpox."

On the touchy issue of Iran, the Russian president rejected as a legend that Iran is receiving technology from Russia for missiles and weapons of mass destruction.

"We have not ever sold anything to Iran, out of the range of technology or information that would help Iran develop missiles, or weapons of mass destruction," Putin said.

Russia has some projects with Iran in atomic energy, he said. But "it has nothing to do with developing nuclear weapons. We are categorically opposed to transferring any technologies to Iran that would help it develop nuclear weapons."

The issue has been underlined as serious and troubling by U.S. officials, who otherwise speak warmly of growing rapport between Washington and Moscow.

On another front, Putin ruled out sending Russian troops to Afghanistan to help the United States root out Osama bin Laden and smash his al-Qaeda terrorist network.

"To us, this solution would be unacceptable. To us, sending troops to Afghanistan is like for you, the U.S., returning your troops to Vietnam," Putin said. The Soviet Union fought a 10-year war in Afghanistan before withdrawing in defeat in 1989.

Still, Putin said the Russian army is helping the United States in rescue operations, even on Afghan territory, and said he had shown Bush intelligence data indicating terrorists in the separatist republic of Chechnya plan to kill Americans.

"The Americans should know about that," Putin said.

Reaffirming Russia's support for the U.S. war against terrorism, Putin said it would be very difficult but possible to find bin Laden.

On the war itself, Putin said the United States was losing not in the military but in the information.

the heart of the Yankees are players who have come up through the system — guys that never have played with anyone except the Yankees. I am talking about Bernie Williams, Andy Pettitte, Jorge Posada, Alfonso Soriano, Rivera and Derek Jeter.

A sore loser I am not. The D's back beat the Yankees at their own game and beat Rivera who looked untouchable the inning before. And by doing so, they proved my point perfectly.

It doesn't matter how much you spend. The Yankees' payroll is way bigger than that of the D's backs. So now that a team that doesn't have the biggest payroll in the league won, we finally can put all this talk of the Yankees' buying their titles to rest.

If you are upset about the huge gap in payrolls between teams like the Yankees and Royals, blame the owners. The difference in payrolls is due to a huge disparity in the revenue each team generates. While things such as ticket and concession sales play a part in generating revenue, a huge majority of it comes from TV contracts. Each Major League club splits the money from baseball's national TV deal (this money comes from ESPN's and FOX's broadcasts during the season).

The real money comes from local TV contracts. Teams such as the Yankees, Mets, Cubs and Braves have these deals with local cable TV channels that pay them huge money to show almost every game they play.

The only way this will change is if the owners vote to accept a new way of splitting the money. The NFL and NBA have shown there are fair ways to share revenue. Don't bet on it, though. While it would be nice to see a level playing field, would you want to share your hard-earned money with another team so that team could have a better chance of beating you? I think not.

12-leading 453.8 yards of total offense — including 315.8 yards on the ground, good for tops in the nation.

"As soon as a guy gets out of position, it's over," Snyder said. "You can bank on the fact that there's trouble up ahead. Against some football teams, the damage might be somewhat minuscule or not extremely harmful.

"Against Nebraska, it's probably a death wish."

It's a wish that fully revolves around quarterback and top Heisman Trophy candidate Eric Crouch.

The senior is posting 209.9 yards of total offense per game, completing more than 57 percent of his passes through the air and rushing for nearly 85 yards per outing, fourth best in the conference.

"He has a great deal of knowledge of what their offense is all about, and not only can run it, but could very easily coach it — I'm quite sure," Snyder said. "I think it's just the experience. He was a tremendous player the first time we played him, and nothing's changed in that respect.

"I think it's like fine wine, I guess. You just get a little better with age — whatever fine wine is."

Snyder said he's using specific players in practice, namely back-up quarterback Jeff Schwinn and redshirt freshman tailback Carlos Alsop, to simulate Crouch's speed and quick-read ability on the option — with an emphasis on the word "simulate."

"I would hate to think that we have a Heisman Trophy candidate running scout squad," Snyder said.

Crouch can't be the entire focus of K-State's defensive gameplan, though, or tailback Dahiran Diedrick will find a way to hurt them, Snyder said.

Diedrick leads the conference this season with 1,097 yards, averaging 5.7 yards per carry and scoring 12 touchdowns on the year — second only to Crouch's 15.

"He's a silent 1,000-yard rusher,"

Snyder said. "I mean, all of a sudden, you don't know about it unless you just happen to read it hidden some place in their stats. That's over 100 yards per ball game, so that's pretty doggone good."

Plus, if it's not the quarterback or tailback chalking up the yardage, Nebraska has another option that always has been a stronghold — the fullback, Snyder said.

Sophomore Judd Davies has handled that responsibility this year, following in the footsteps of celebrated bruisers such as Tom Rathman, Cory Schlesinger, and Jeff and Joel Makovicka.

"Just about the time you're trying to run outside and tackle Crouch or get Diedrick off tackle or around the end, they hand it off to that fullback," Snyder said. "And all of a sudden, he's getting seven or eight yards, and it's second down and two. That's a major part of their offense in my way of thinking. It always has been, ever since I've been here."

But Nebraska's offense isn't the only unit receiving accolades lately. The Cats, ranked second nationally in run defense (67.1 ypg), have allowed nine points and zero touchdowns in the last two games, and only 575 total yards in its past three outings — including just 174 yards at Iowa State last weekend.

Bennett said those numbers are only the beginning.

"Honestly, I think we can get better. I keep reading about this resurgence, but we haven't been chopped liver all year," Bennett said. "I've been proud of these kids. For eight kids that haven't been starters, and with the exception of the second half of the Texas Tech game — which I'm telling you was me more than them — they've done everything we've asked them to do."

And linebacker Ben Leber said there's no better time for the defense to peak than the end of the year, especially with Nebraska on the late-season schedule.

"We've shown in the past couple of games that we've been playing, for the most part, pretty mistake-free," Leber said. "Everybody's been hitting their gaps and doing their things, so going into a game like this — that's the type of attitude. That's the type of leverage we need right now."

BUDGET

"Faculty development is where I personally see it most serious," Verschelden, professor of sociology, said. "We don't have money to go to conferences. We've all made concessions over years: paying for things ourselves, doing things other ways, not using papers."

Infrastructure is another problem area for K-State, Peterson said. Finding money to maintain buildings can be difficult enough. Building anything new is nearly impossible, she said.

"In essence, most of us would agree that K-State is not well funded," said Tom Rawson, vice president of administration and finance. "This is not a new finding. It's something we've dealt with for years and years and years."

TUITION OWNERSHIP

In spring 2001, the Kansas Legislature granted state universities control over their tuition rates.

Previously, the legislature set tuition rates, which usually were in line with inflation at about 3 to 4 percent.

This year, K-State and the five other regents universities will set their own tuition.

"The legislature is handing us the tools to handle our own destiny," Peterson said.

"I think we're equipped to do that." Already, three-fourths of the states have similar tuition ownership models, Rawson said.

"It's a positive development if the state truly follows through and allows the universities to chart their own courses," Sen. David Adkins, R-Leawood, said.

K-State officials are in the process of meeting with students and faculty to discuss possibilities and answer questions. Early next year, they will meet with the Kansas Board of Regents to discuss their progress and a five-year goal. Then, they will present the regents with their final decision, who will present the tuition amount to the legislature.

"The board is wanting to hear from the schools," said Marvin Burris, budget director for the regents. "They'll be interested in knowing the campus process in the developmental process."

Because each university is different, Adkins said, this will allow each to tailor its tuition to its needs.

"Each university has its own strength. Each has experienced and energetic leaders at helm," he said. "We should be less concerned with micromanaging each institution."

CONCERNS

Student Body President Kyle Barker said he wants to assure prospective students that Kansans who want a college education can afford one.

"We'd love to give everything we could, but we can't afford to support our entire university," he said. "It will hurt the students because it's coming right out of our pockets."

"I see the value of increasing tuition, but we will continue to argue that students can't take all this on."

Kansas always has been a low tuition-low financial aid state. If it changes, steps will be taken to assure that families are not priced out of education, officials said.

If tuition is increased significantly, the amount of financial aid available will increase with it, Rawson said.

About 75 percent of all Kansas high school graduates seek some sort of higher education, Adkins said.

"One of great traditions is, we've supported education as a way of enhancing our quality of life," he said. "If that number were to decline, I'd be very concerned that we were pricing students out of an education."

Some questions also have been raised regarding the state's commitment to funding higher education.

Officials said a tuition increase will not replace state funds.

"I think it's a risk, but it's always been part of the plan that it wouldn't replace state funding," Peterson said. "We would fight on behalf of the students hard if that did take place."

"Students should fund their education. Not be paying for prisons, highways, social service programs."

Adkins said state legislators would maintain their commitment to education.

"The state plays a vital role in education," he said. "We live in the Information Age. A state that's not investing in its educational infrastructure is not keeping up."

WHY IS THIS INCREASE NECESSARY?

K-State is at the point where it needs to move forward, Barker said.

Without adequate funding, it can't achieve that.

"We've come to a crossroads," he said. "Although we've had the ability to keep some great faculty around and do some things that are unprecedented with our budget, we need to go above and beyond."

The university will collect $49.1 million in tuition revenue this year. Just to continue what the university is able to do now — without expanding any of its programs or technology — it will cost $60 million. That would require a 4-percent tuition increase.

Raising funds also is an integral part of becoming a top 10 land-grant university, Peterson said, which President Jon Wefald set as the university's goal earlier this year.

But with a tight state budget, Adkins said, no one should expect much financially this year.

"It's not going to be a good year for higher education," he said. "It's not going to be a good year for any state programs."

U.S. continues anthrax fight

BY LAURAN NEERGAARD
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Eight days after the last anthrax diagnosis, a top federal health official said Tuesday the worst might be over.

But another attack, perhaps by some means other than the mail, can't be ruled out. And it's possible, although unlikely, that next month when thousands of people end their preventive antibiotics, a case or two might still pop up.

Could lingering contamination from the anthrax-tainted letters mailed to New York, Florida and Washington cause more infections?

"For this episode, we're out of the woods," Dr. Anthony Fauci of the National Institutes of Health told The Associated Press. "However, another letter could come in addressed to whomever, you or me, who knows?"

In Washington, thousands of pounds of mail addressed to government agencies have been piling up since an anthrax-tainted letter arrived at Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle's office Oct. 15. The Postal Service said Tuesday it had begun sanitizing this mail and would start delivering it within 24 to 48 hours.

The Postal Service hired a second company to cleanse the mail by irradiating it. Facilities in Bridgeport, N.J., and Lima, Ohio, now are tackling that massive effort. Each site is expected to cleanse about 750,000 pieces of mail a day, most coming from Washington, New Jersey and New York, where anthrax contamination was confirmed in some post offices.

More post offices around the country were being tested for possible contamination. Closed post offices in New Jersey reopened Tuesday, as did the Manhattan hospital that was closed when a worker died of inhaled anthrax.

Still facing cleanup is the Hart Senate Office Building where Daschle's office is located. Officials on Tuesday abandoned plans to pump chlorine dioxide gas into the building amid fears it might not work and now say the building will not reopen before Nov. 21.

Four people have died of inhaled anthrax since tainted letters were mailed in mid-September, and 13 others are fighting either the inhaled or milder skin form of the disease.

But it has been eight days since the last confirmed diagnosis — a good sign that the worst is over, Fauci said.

The most troublesome victim is Kathy Nguyen, the Manhattan hospital worker whose Oct. 31 death still has federal investigators baffled. Despite repeated testing, investigators have found no sign that she came in contact with anthrax-tainted mail, nor have they found any of the bacteria at her home, workplace or route to work.

KSU unaffected by KU credit decision

BY ALYSON RALETZ

Kansas State Collegian

Efforts to ban credit card soliciting on the University of Kansas campus will not affect K-State soliciting policies, Student Body President Kyle Barker said.

"There are no efforts to ban credit cards on our campus," Barker said. "We have a different situation than KU."

K-State informs its students of the dangers of getting a bad credit history early in their lives, he said.

Sull, he said he believes it is important to give students the opportunity to make their own financial decisions.

"I believe students are adults and can decide whether they want a credit card or not," he said. "Whether it's people on campus or not, they are still going to be solicited in the real world like any adult would be."

KU Student Senate hopes to create legislation that would regulate credit card solicitation by late November. Emporia State and Fort Hays State universities both have prohibited most credit card solicitation on their campuses.

Justin Mills, KU student body president, said credit card solicitors are a big problem on his campus.

At least three days a week, Mills said, students can expect to be hounded by credit card representatives offering T-shirts, CDs and basketballs to those who give in and sign their applications.

"We shouldn't be condoning a practice that actively preys on students and is bad for students," Mills said.

"Campus shouldn't be a marketplace for products. It should be a marketplace for ideas."

It is ridiculous for students to have to take out loans after graduation just to pay off their credit card bills, he said. It is not fair when they are marketed specifically to students, he said, because the effects follow them for the rest of their lives.

"When they leave college, they initially get low-paying jobs and have to pay off money beyond their student loans," he said. "If they have bad credit from college, they will have problems buying a house, a car or getting a job since some employers run credit checks."

"The mistakes they make in college obviously play into the long-term life after college. The credit card companies are not informing the students about the risks."

KU Senate also is trying to write legislation that would inhibit not only credit cards, but also all selling on campus, he said. The governing body might not prevent all product solicitation, he said, but limit it to one week out of every semester.

According to K-State policy, the only credit card solicitor allowed in the K-State

AMERICA RESPONDS

U.S. halts terrorist financing

BY RON FOURNIER

The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In a crackdown at home and abroad, the Bush administration targeted Osama bin Laden's multimillion-dollar financial networks Wednesday, closing businesses in four states, detaining U.S. suspects and urging allies to help choke off money supplies in 40 nations.

"By shutting these networks down, we disrupt the murderers' work," President Bush said, announcing the first major crackdown on companies, organizations and people suspected of aiding terrorists from U.S. soil.

Across Europe and from coast to coast in America, police conducted raids designed to unravel two Islamic financial networks accused of laundering and raising money and providing other support to bin Laden's al-Qaeda organization.

Investigators said they believe tens of millions of dollars a year flowed overseas through the Al-Barakaat network, much of it from money that Somalis living in America send home to relatives. Some of that money was skimmed for use by al-Qaeda and other terrorist networks, investigators said.

In Mogadishu, Somalia, the chairman of the Al-Barakaat group, which operates in 40 nations including the United States, vehemently denied the White House allegations.

"This is all lies," Ahmed Nur Ali Jim'ale told The Associated Press in a telephone interview from Dubai. "We are people who are hard-working and have nothing to do with terrorists."

Talk focuses on religious similarities

Understanding the past and the future and learning about the Jewish and Islamic traditions will help Americans learn more about themselves, said S. Daniel Breslauer, professor of religious studies at the University of Kansas.

Breslauer focused his lecture, "Seeing Ourselves, Seeing Others — Americans and the World," on this belief Wednesday afternoon.

Among the things Breslauer spoke about in the lecture were similarities between the Jewish and Islamic traditions. He said he was disturbed by the discriminatory view of Muslims after the Sept. 11 attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. While

CONSTRUCTION RIGHT ON TRACK

Alumni building expected to reach completion by August '02

BY KECIA N. SEYB

Kansas State Collegian

All plans for The KSU Alumni Association's new center are on track.

"The construction is right on schedule," said Brad Sidener, vice president of the Alumni Association. "Everything — all the contractors and all the materials have shown up on time — everything's going on schedule."

On schedule means the new alumni center, south of Old Memorial Stadium, completely funded by private donations, should be completed by August 2002 or early September, Sidener said.

The center also has stuck with its budget — $12.7 million, he said, and so far, there have been no setbacks.

"The weather this winter will play a role in whether we stay on schedule," Sidener said, "but if the schedule continues as it is, we should be moved on time."

The Alumni Association originally was in Anderson Hall and moved to Hollis House — where Throckmorton Hall is now — in 1970 with the KSU Foundation. Then it moved with the foundation to Anderson Avenue in 1991.

The staff has outgrown its space in the fourth floor of the KSU Foundation building, so 11 years later, the Alumni Association will return to the K-State campus, which makes Jeanine Lake, who has worked for the Alumni Association for 14 years, happy.

"To go back will be very nice," Lake, director of information services, said.

She said there will be some differences, though, since now she and her co-workers all are on one floor, and at the new site, they will occupy two floors.

"When we get into the new building, we're going to be in a more departmentalized situation," she said. "That's going to be an adjustment, but we're all looking forward to it."

About 60 percent of the center will be for the public. All Command changes at Fort Riley; former presiding officer to serve at Pentagon

BY TREVOR BURGESS

Kansas State Collegian

A revolutionary war cannon, which once signaled the beginning of America, was fired Wednesday to signal the beginning days of a new commander for the 24th Infantry Division and Fort Riley.

Maj. Gen. Thomas F. Metz took over the command of the 24th Infantry Division and Fort Riley from Maj. Gen. Robert J. St. Onge Jr., who has served as commander since Aug. 4, 2000. Onge now will be working at the Pentagon, where he said he is looking forward to beginning his new duties, which include mobilization, readiness and training for all services. Onge said he thinks his job at Fort Riley has prepared him for his new job.

"I have had three national guard brigades that I have been responsible for," Onge said. "I have worked in the last four or five years with guard and reserves — mostly Army — but now I will have a chance to expand that to the other services."

Onge also said he had a three-year tour at the Pentagon and said he loved it. He said the recent attacks on the Pentagon didn't change his feelings about the job at all.

"I really enjoyed the challenge of working at that level," he said. "That sets the stage for going back. It's no different now that it has been attacked. I will go back and work there just as willingly as I did four or five years ago."

For Metz, coming back to Kansas is a homecoming. In the past, he served as the Division and Fort Riley Chief of Staff until June 1995. Most recently, he was the vice director for Force Structure, Resources and Assessment. Metz said that when he was at Fort Riley earlier in the '90s, it was the finest assignment he had to date in his career and he is excited to come back.

"I am excited to get reacquainted with a wonderful community that surrounds Fort Riley," Metz said. "It will also be nice to get back on the Army's best training installation."

Metz said he was impressed with the soldiers and the community of Fort Riley as a whole.

"You have soldiers here. You have great training capabilities and a great community," he said.

Metz stressed that his first order of business is to find out what has changed at Fort Riley since he left six years ago.

"I left six years ago as the chief of staff, and I knew the installation well," he said. "The new mission of the 24th Division and its relationship with the National Guard I still need to learn."

While Onge said he is very happy to get the opportunity to go back to the Pentagon, Metz said he is equally excited to get the opportunity to work with troops again.

"I wanted to come here because this is where my experience and expertise can best be used," Metz said. "I learned a lot in my job at the Pentagon, but it's training soldiers in this environment that I think I can do best for the armed forces, and that's why I am so glad to be here."

Local high school enters lockdown following threat

Manhattan High School West Campus entered lockdown Wednesday afternoon after a bomb threat was called in.

At 12:36 p.m., a male voice called in, stating there was a bomb on campus. Students and staff were instructed to remain in their classrooms until a search of the grounds was completed.

No bomb was found, and classes resumed under normal schedule.

"Nothing is out of the ordinary," said Michele Jones, coordinator of communications for Manhattan-Ogden USD 383.

Jones said there is no connection to the bomb threat called in Oct. 3 by a female voice, but the investigation is ongoing with the Riley County Police Department.

The Oct. 3 bomb threat marked the first one in three years for the school district.

"We hope this is not a continuing trend," Jones said. "The high school staff talked to students about the seriousness of the threats. We are not taking this lightly."

STATE IN BRIEF

By The Associated Press

Attorney General examines options in Microsoft case

TOPEKA — Attorney General Carla Stovall declined Tuesday to sign on to the settlement agreement with Microsoft, saying Kansas will proceed with an antitrust lawsuit with at least three other states.

Stovall said her staff and those of other attorneys general had reviewed intensely Microsoft's agreement with the Justice Department before deciding not to accept the deal.

The settlement requires Microsoft to provide technical details to help rivals make products compatible with its monopoly Windows operating system and to give an oversight panel full access to its books and plans for five years.

It also bans exclusive contracts with computer makers that put rival software vendors at a disadvantage.

"My conversations with industry experts, including state officials, have led me to believe that while the revised settlement provides more protection than the original DOJ settlement, it does not sufficiently restore fair competition and stop Microsoft's illegal conduct," Stovall said.

Kansas joined 17 states and the federal government in filing an antitrust lawsuit against the computer software giant in 1998.

Firestone paying millions to states for tire damages

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Bridgestone/Firestone Inc. will pay $11.5 million in a settlement to head off lawsuits by states over defective tires the company recalled more than a year ago.

Each of the 50 states, Washington, D.C., Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands will get $500,000, according to a copy of the settlement obtained by The Associated Press.

Nashville, Tenn.-based Bridgestone/Firestone also will spend $5 million on a consumer education campaign and $10 million to reimburse attorneys' fees for the states.

Bridgestone/Firestone announced a recall of 6.5 million ATX, ATX II and Wilderness AT tires Aug. 9, 2000, after receiving reports that some tires suddenly failed.

Since then, federal investigators have documented 271 deaths from thousands of accidents involving the tires.

U.S. military forces aiding anti-Taliban Afghan troops

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Working alongside Afghan rebels, small teams of Americans are on the ground in Afghanistan, giving ammunition, arms and advice to fighters they hope will overthrow the Taliban.

Operating in secret, U.S. special forces also are helping pick targets for U.S. warplanes as the military campaign hits a hurry-up pace aimed at making progress before winter.

In southern Afghanistan, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said, U.S. forces have been in and out, gathering intelligence and trying to reach out to Pashtun leaders who might help overthrow the Taliban.

"We are supporting as best we can," said Gen. Peter Pace, vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

U.S. secret warriors — about 100 in at least four locations — are bringing to the fight weapons, food, water, blankets, winter uniforms and food for the opposition's horses.

Postal Service increases reward in Anthrax cases

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Postal Service upped its reward offer in the anthrax-by-mail attacks.

The advertising company Advo chipped in $250,000 to boost the reward to $1.25 million, Postmaster General John E. Potter announced Wednesday.

Potter spoke at a gathering of top executives of the mailing industry where companies offered their support to the beleaguered agency.

"The anthrax attacks are changing the way all of us do business," Potter said.

The business leaders explored new avenues for making the mail they send to American households and business even safer than it is today.

He said Advo President Gary M. Mulloy had contributed the extra funds for the reward in hopes of encouraging the public to come forward with clues.

"There's going to be more of an opportunity for education here. All the courses I am taking are not available in England"

English student utilizes accent to own advantage

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Sam Hiett's English accent gets him out of many problems. "I'm sorry I am English, I didn't understand," or "Oh bloody hell," is all I have to say," Hiett said. "Just having a cool accent has gotten me access to a lot of areas."

Librarians, policemen and parking attendants have given him the benefit of the doubt once he explains he is not from the United States and did not understand he was breaking any rules, he said.

"It's kind of an inside thing," he said. "A lot of us use it, I guess not anymore."

Hiett, an exchange student from Newmarket, England, would be a senior at the University of Hertfordshire, except he decided to study in Manhattan for a year before graduation.

He is studying geography, and he likes his courses so much, he said, that after he graduates in England, he plans to return to K-State and pursue a graduate degree.

"There's going to be more of an opportunity for education here," he said. "All the courses I am taking are not available in England."

He said his home university, he only studies geography. Students do not attend classes outside of their concentration, he said. He said he is glad he has the chance to take a history or art class if he wants at K-State.

Manhattan is the not the first place in America he has visited. He has spent the last four summers traveling along the East Coast, visiting the southern states and has ventured as far north as Seattle.

He said that while he visited the country's major attractions, he got to interact with American tourists.

"Most people ask me why I chose Kansas," he said. "They ask, 'Why not New York or Florida?' And I say that I have been there and done that."

"I wanted to do something else. Most people wouldn't come to the Midwest and see the real America."

The second network, al Taqua, is a loosely organized band of companies in Switzerland, Liechtenstein, the Bahamas and Italy, the White House said. It is controlled by Youssef Nada, a naturalized Italian citizen, whose assets the United States wants frozen in overseas banks.

Acting on the United States' request, officials from Switzerland, Italy and Liechtenstein moved to block al Taqua assets. Two Arab financiers, Youssef M. Nada and Ali Himmat, were questioned by Swiss police for several hours before being released.

In all, the names of 62 entities and people were added to a list of suspected terrorist associates targeted by Bush in an executive order signed last month. The earlier list included 88 groups or people whose assets had been frozen because of their ties to al-Qaeda and other terrorist groups.

In coordinated raids Wednesday, Customs agents seized evidence and shut down Al-Barakaat companies in four cities: Boston, Minneapolis, Seattle and Columbus, Ohio. The Treasury Department froze assets of nine organizations and two people in the United States, most with links to Al-Barakaat.

In addition, evidence was seized at two businesses in northern Virginia that also have Al-Barakaat business, said officials who spoke on condition of anonymity.

In Boston, Mohamed M. Hussein and Liban M. Hussein were charged with running an illegal money-transmitting business, according to a criminal complaint. Officials said Mohamed Hussein was in custody.

The two men ran Barakaat North America Inc. in Dorchester, Mass., a foreign money exchange, without a state license, according to a U.S. Customs Service affidavit. The business moved over $2 million through a U.S. bank from January through September, the government said.

The raids shined a national spotlight on seemingly nondescript storefronts.

U.S. Postal Service worker Sunday Draper, who delivers mail to a targeted business in Ohio, said, "It's scary to think they may have ties to terrorists."

Federal agents seized office furniture, computers, sealed boxes and trash cans from Barakaat Enterprise in Columbus.

A man was detained briefly in Seattle after federal agents raided a Muslim grocery store containing a wire-transfer operation.

Five organizations and one person, Garad Jama, were targeted in Minnesota. Agents detained at least one man.

"Today, we take another important action to expose the enemy to the light and to disrupt its ability to threaten America and innocent life," Bush said at a Treasury Department investigation center just outside Washington in northern Virginia.

Secretary of State Colin Powell said, "Money is the oxygen of terrorism."

The event was designed to show progress in the broad anti-terrorism campaign, countering doubts about the U.S.-led military operations in Afghanistan and the administration's response to anthrax scares.

The United States also asked allies to freeze assets on terrorist-aiding organizations based in Switzerland, Somalia, Liechtenstein, the Bahamas, Sweden, Canada, Austria, Italy and the United Arab Emirates.

The United Arab Emirates seized assets and records of Al-Barakaat

The United States has blocked $26 million in assets of the Taliban and al-Qaeda. An additional $17 million has been blocked by other countries, bringing the worldwide total to $43 million, a Treasury spokeswoman said.

To date, 112 countries have blocking orders in force.

K-State's policy on credit cards satisfactory

The University of Kansas is following the lead of other colleges by considering a ban on credit card sales.

KU officials say they are plagued by student-sponsored credit card solicitors about three times a week. Justin Mills, KU student body president, said they want to ban this practice because he feels they should not condone practices that actively prey on students.

This is not an issue that needs to be examined here.

About one day a week, credit card solicitors set up a booth either in the K-State Student Union Plaza or in main passing areas on campus. To solicit, these groups must be sponsored by an on-campus group. The groups that sponsor solicitors typically receive proceeds from the day of peddling cards to students.

Students are old enough to make the decision of whether to own a credit card, and they must take responsibility for their actions. If students hated credit cards or felt they were detrimental, there would not be flocks of students signing up for them.

If we ban solicitors, then we ban crucial funding for some campus organizations. If students want credit cards, it is their business.

Cheerleaders are not athletes, because cheerleading is not a sport. They may be in great physical condition, but doesn't there have to be a winner and a loser for a sport?

I am from Nebraska and not a Husker fan. As much as I would like K-State to beat Nebraska, it isn't going to happen. Face reality.

According to ESPN rankings, Willie's butt isn't even listed. Get over it girls.

Now that the old student death building is going to replace Denison Hall, let's see if we can work on air conditioning or ventilation in Eisenhower Hall.

Hey, Bill Snyder and the Wildcats, I promised my mom a K-State win over Nebraska for her birthday. Do you think you can deliver please?

You don't walk through the football field in the middle of football practices, so please don't walk through the track in the middle of track practice.

Smell that shoe.

My friend gave Willie the Wildcat her number. Does he have to wear the headgear out on the date?

There is no greater sexual frustration than a walk through Body Hall.

Yeah, I have a case of Niagara, and I was just wondering if any ladies would like to come over tonight.

Actually, it is illegal to ride your bicycle on the sidewalk. A policeman told me the proper way to ride your bicycle is in the street with other moving traffic, so why don't you just get in the other damn lane.

I am sorry, but every time I see the yearbook mascot guy, I want to push him down the stairs so bad. Does that make me a bad person?

You don't read mind bullets. You dodge them.

I want to be a male cheerleader. I would love that deal.

COMEBACK KIDS

Public's cynicism of fading celebrities understandable

The entertainment arena recently has seen the return of two old pros, very different in abilities, but similar in desire.

Michael Jordan and Michael Jackson have re-entered the limelight, splashing their way back into the mainstream and public opinion — candidly cynical public opinion.

The public's cynicism is not surprising. It seems the natural reaction to any "comeback" made by fading celebrities, especially the two Michaels in question. With Jordan's seemingly indecisive stance on his basketball career and Jackson's attempts to match the success of "Thriller," these men are prime targets for backlash and criticism.

Is the cynicism understandable? Yes. Justifiable? No.

There is no need to belittle people who choose to prolong their dreams, their abilities — no matter their status, age or personal life.

Yet, these factors seem adequate to measure the worth of these men. Since Jordan's return to the court, comparison has been made to his previous accomplishments with the Chicago Bulls. This is logical. The man has six NBA championship rings, five MVP trophies and a long list of league titles and statistics.

However, these statistics are detrimental to the success of Jordan's return. The fact that he is just a man returning to the game he loves, is overshadowed by his past accomplishments.

His age has been cause for scrutiny, along with his less-than-stellar performances as of late. Jordan's Wizards versus the Knicks game Oct. 30 recently was criticized. Yet, figures have shown his shooting percentage and assists were almost identical to that of his 1995 return to the game, according to a recent article by Newsweek and www.msnbc.com. Although he isn't showing the aggressive behavior on the court known earlier in his career, Jordan is faring well by all standards.

It is hard for the public to remove the iconic image of Jordan implanted by years of success. It is difficult to allow him a chance to play just because he still can.

Jordan isn't looking to recreate his glory days. He truthfully states, "I'm a little older. The game is a little different. But I feel good."

Michael Jackson seems to be in good health as well. Although his image has been marred by past drug addiction and dismissed child molestation charges, he too has stepped boldly back into the spotlight.

Where Jordan's critics seem obsessed by his former career statistics, Jackson often is ridiculed for his personal rather than professional choices.

Jackson's frequent trips to the plastic surgeon seem to generate more buzz than his latest album, "Invincible." The self-anointed King of Pop has changed over time into an increasingly bizarre individual by most standards.

Do any of his past actions change the fact Jackson still can carry a tune? And still can Moonwalk with the grace of younger wannabes? Not by a long shot.

Although Jackson's latest release, "You Rock My World," isn't the musical phenomena "Thriller" proved to be, Jackson, like Jordan, is just trying to stay in the game as long as his talent permits.

Am I so naive to believe these two men are returning to the entertainment arena solely for artistic integrity and longevity?

No. Increasing amounts of money and fame surely were factors.

However, their return could benefit not only their bank accounts, but also the cynics so eager to tear these icons down. As humans mature, new outlooks and approaches emerge. Jordan's style might be less aggressive than in previous years, but new techniques are sure to develop for the basketball player and the game as a whole.

Jackson has been considered a pop music pioneer, and if allowed to explore new musical stylings, might continue to be so.

By encouraging these men, we are encouraging a refreshing change from bubble gum pop culture.

Their new spin on old talent could prove beneficial to the entertainment industry, which is so quick to exploit and exhaust talent, eager to move on to the next young Michael.

Self-improvement adds to life's complications

There is a great deal of precision in our actions.

Today, I went for a run, studied and called an ex-boyfriend.

Why? I want to increase my endurance, earn good grades and try to catch up with What'shisname.

A majority of our activities have a single objective: to make us better. Drivers want faster cars to impress mechanically obsessed friends.

The business-minded work toward promotions in an attempt to improve their financial situations. And, thankfully, most buy deodorant to improve the olfactory situation for those sitting within a one-foot radius.

This focus on improvement of the self has its advantages. It fosters a determination that helps people work harder at becoming better. The desire for good grades keeps (some) students from skipping classes on sunny afternoons. Sloppy guys clean their apartments so crusty plates and underwear do not repulse girlfriends.

Sometimes our studies can get us only so far. There are some things better left alone.

Making out is one of them. On my floor, you will see a number of Cosmopolitans and other fluff, yet strangely entertaining literary works. Emblazoned across Cosmo's November issue is a challenge: "Be His Best Ever! How to satisfy the naughty male needs most women ignore."

Sounds juicy, but unrealistic. A woman might benefit from reading these secrets and picking up a hint or two. However, there is a point where any vixen wannabe must draw the line.

Imagine the situations these articles create. A young woman stages her next passionate scenario in her mind. Later that night, her memory fails — just when she needs it most. She must find a subtle way to reach over her man and reread Step No. 3.

Honey, ease up. Let el amor flow naturally. Be confident that, whatever you do, studmuffin will be satisfied by your mere presence.

As far as I am concerned, you can read all you want about "the amazing butterfly kiss" from November's Redbook. But at some point, you have to trust your own instincts. Try putting the Cosmo and Maxims away. You might be surprised that you already know how to lock those lips.

Another forced form of self-improvement is what we eat. The diet is, of course, one of the most important aspects of personal health and the reason I keep eating those damned turkey sandwiches on wheat bread. But the "to eat" and "not to eat" lists have gone too far, too fast.

The best example is the egg. In my short lifetime, the reputation of these slimy little ovals has been to hell and back.

First, they were really good for us and were piled upon breakfast plates everywhere.

Then, they were considered the incarnation of death by cholesterol. Now, they are coming back into style and are back on the griddle.

There are too many specifics inundating our minds. Broccoli might have been last year's cure for cancer, but who knows what "miracle food" is next? What will it do this time: remove bunions or reduce knobby knees? No doubt another wondrous cure is lurking around the corner.

It is impossible to keep up with these trends. Hints on how to eat right and feel better are always welcome in my life. At some point, however, you just have to pray to the nutrition gods that the really important bases in the health field are covered.

Life is complicated enough. There are plenty of aspects in our lives that we should work to improve. However, making out and food are two among many pleasures that should not be left unadulterated.

Study, work and make plans. But don't forget to allow yourself the freedom to eat, drink and be a little merry, and instruction-free.

Handyman finds local niche; starts home-repair business

BY KERI GEFERT
Kansas State Collegian

With the pressure of getting tasks done at work, many businesses and homeowners don't have the time or the resources to complete necessary jobs in the home.

Craig Celmer has found a way to turn those jobs into a successful business — the Honey-Do Handyman, which he owns and operates.

After working with a contractor in a neighboring community, Celmer saw a need for repair work in the Manhattan community. Last February, he thought of the idea.

Celmer said he always has had a knack for repairing things.

"Even growing up, my dad always would say, 'Have Craig fix it.' It was something that came natural to me," Celmer said.

The Honey-Do Handyman caters to business and home repairs. While professionals in the COMMUNITY is a series profiling professionals who have positions K-State students are working toward.

Who: Craig Celmer
Position: Handyman

he started with mostly small repair jobs, Celmer said those jobs have led to larger repairs. But he said he hasn't forgotten the mission of his business.

"I'm not losing focus of what I'm initially going after, and that's helping people take care of their homes," Celmer said.

Celmer said helping people fine-tune their home is a niche market he has capitalized on in the Manhattan community. He said he has sacrificed his time to the business to make it a success. He said that would be his advice to anyone starting a small business.

"Anyone can do it. You have to give your heart and soul to that business," Celmer said. "If you believe in yourself, you can do it."

Besides relying on his business degree to operate the business, Celmer has taken advantage of the Small Business Development Center on campus. The center helps small business entrepreneurs with free business advice.

"Part of Craig's success is because of his well-developed work ethic," Frederick Rice, director of SBD, said. "He is building a positive reputation where his customers are more willing to recommend him to their friends."

A positive reputation is required for success in business, Celmer said.

"Everything is business. What you do and how you act is going to be compared to your business," Celmer said.

LECTURE

the actions should not be condoned, he said people shouldn't blame the religion itself because religions are very similar to one another.

"The thing we have to realize is that we learn more about ourselves by listening to other people," Breslauer said. "We naturally have this external war and internal war. Yet, as humans, I think we find it easier to fight against each other rather than question ourselves."

Breslauer said one of the biggest conflicts in religion is the sense of having uniformity for the religion pertaining to ethnicity.

Ayah McGuinness, freshman in political science, said she disagrees with this statement because while some Muslims want uniformity in ethnicity, that is not the majority.

"It doesn't matter if you are Turkish, African-American, European and so on — what connects us Muslims is our common faith," McGuinness said. "Yet, I know that is not how it is with everyone, though."

Lyman Baker, instructor of English, said the lecture was lively because it made people in the audience question themselves.

"I thought the lecture was very rich," Baker said. "The interesting thing is, he wants you to notice new things about yourself, while at the same time he is swimming against defining himself."

K-State sophomore forward Andrea Armstrong tries to steal the ball away from Houston Jaguar defender Anitra Davis during the first half of the Cats' exhibition game Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

FRESH START

Newcomers contribute to home win

BY MICHAEL NOLL

Kansas State Collegian

Women's basketball head coach Deb Patterson did not hide her emotions after her basketball team trounced the Houston Jaguars 83-53.

"The first shot was a dream come true," she said.

Patterson could have spoken as enthusiastically about her four freshman starters — forwards Kendra Wecker and Megan Mahoney and guards Laurie Koehn and Kari Hanson — who accounted for 50 points.

Or she could have been praising Wecker, who led the team with 21 points.

Or the fact that the Cats kept a team with four players who either have played or still play in the WNBA to just 28.4-percent shooting.

Instead, Patterson was applauding the team's very first basket of the game, in which Mahoney slashed to the basket and laid the ball in for two points. It was a display of individual playmaking that had been in short supply during the last several seasons for K-State.

"To see one of our perimeter players get to the rim and finish the shot was literally a dream come true," Patterson said, "and it's exactly why we brought Megan Mahoney into the program, and she stepped up and did her job."

Overall, K-State shot 51.6 percent from the field. More importantly, though, was K-State's level of defense, Patterson said.

"We didn't let them ignite, and I thought that was big. I thought, defensively, we were able to get that team to stand still," she said, "and that was critical because this is a very athletic and talented team if you let them get in motion."

On the other side of the ball, K-State not only outquicked and outshot the Jaguars, but also struck early. Within the first 90 seconds of the game, K-State already had jumped to a 6-3 lead. The first two baskets came from two different freshmen who were feeling out their first collegiate game.

"Before the game, I could barely breathe. I was so nervous," Mahoney said. "But once we got going and got in the flow of things, it went good. There was a lot of things to work on, obviously, but it was good to get a feel of the game."

Not everything went perfect for K-State, though, and the freshmen, despite their inexperience, were quick to point out the team's mistakes.

"I think we only had nine offensive rebounds," Wecker said. "We can't just rely on our good shooters to make every shot that we put up. We've got to be crashing the boards and going in hard for those."

Perhaps the most positive note all night for K-State was the long-awaited appearance of Koehn. The redshirt freshman was selected as last year's Big 12 Conference Preseason Freshman of the Year but missed the entire season with a foot injury. In her first game back, Koehn recorded average numbers — eight points, two assists and three steals — but was just happy to be on the court.

"It was just indescribable. I can't even put into words how much fun it was," Koehn said. "It's just like you realize how much you love the game when you haven't played for a whole year and then finally get to go out there and play a game. It was unbelievable. It was so much fun."

The entire game could be described in much the same way — fun. That energy, though, is partially due to talent.

Patterson said.

"When you bring more athleticism to the floor, things come easier, and the enthusiasm and excitement created out of energy spreads," she said. "It's a fun way to play basketball. It's not as laborious to get the job done. It's just by nature, then, more fun."

one, and we have to be prepared."

But adequately preparing for the regular season doesn't necessarily mean winning the exhibition games, junior forward Matt Siebrandt said. Although the team and fans would rather see a win to ease concerns of whether this team has improved over last season, Siebrandt said it's more important for the team to work on its game and improve in small steps.

"We are stressing the importance of getting our offense and defense together as well as coming together more as a team before the start of the season," Siebrandt said. "I don't expect us to be a great team right now because as a team, you don't want to peak this early. So it is good that we still have things we can get better at."

One aspect that still needs some tweaking, Wooldridge said, is his team's movement without the basketball. But to say the Cats aren't progressing in other ways wouldn't be completely accurate, he said.

"We tell our players all the time that 80 percent of the game is played without the ball in your hands," Wooldridge said.

"Although this learning experience will be ongoing, we are pleased with where this ball team is at, and I feel we will be a better team in this game."

Another problem the Wildcats faced in the first exhibition game was the team's relative inexperience with each other in a game-like atmosphere. Junior guard Gilson DeJesus said the team suffered from first-game jitters against Global Sports and will look for a more consistent team effort in tonight's contest.

"Nerves were running high in the first game, and we could see that," DeJesus said. "I think in this game, we will try to establish a more sound offense and play more intense defense than the first game."

Perhaps the biggest key to K-State's success this season will lie in the support they get from Wildcat fans. In the first game, more than 6,000 fans filed in to see K-State lose on a last-second shot.

Volleyball beats UT on road

BY SEAN PURCELL

Kansas State Collegian

Going into the last five matches of the season, the K-State volleyball team knew it needed to show how it could be a force in the Big 12 — especially on the road.

On Wednesday night, the team took the first step in accomplishing that goal.

The Cats (15-7, 11-5) took care of Texas (13-10, 7-8) on Wednesday night in Austin, Texas, in a match that made K-State's case for an NCAA tournament bid even stronger.

"I am so proud of the way the team played," head coach Suzie Fritz said. "We just played a consistent match and really did some things to frustrate them."

The Longhorns' frustration seemed to start once the whistle blew to begin the match. Freshman setter Gabby Guerre said she thinks it was a team effort to control the Longhorns that led to the win.

"It was important that we come down here and play well," Guerre said. "We controlled them in pretty much everything, and it is easy to win when you do that."

In fact, K-State controlled the Longhorns in almost every statistical category, scoring more kills (70-55), dominating the hitting percentage (.325-.119) and maintaining the blocking edge (10-9).

Fritz said she thinks the team has stepped up the defensive play in recent matches, giving K-State an added advantage over its opponents and helping the team in other facets of the game.

"We are blocking very well as a team right now," Fritz said. "By staying on teams' tendencies, we have been able to play the game we want to play and do the things we want to do on the court."

After an early Longhorn lead in game one, K-State came back strong. Senior outside hitter Lisa Mimick led the way in a 30-22 game one victory with five kills. Sophomore Cari Jensen and Guerre also chipped in with four kills apiece for the Cats.

It was much of the same in game two, with K-State making just three hitting errors on .395 hitting in a 30-13 win over the Longhorns.

Game three's tale proved to be a little different, as Texas roared back and proved they weren't going to let the Wildcats blank them at home. The Longhorns edged K-State 30-27, sending the match to a game four.

Texas freshman outside hitter Mira Topic was a one-person wrecking crew in game three, tallying 12 of Texas' 20 kills in the win.

Leading 27-16 in the final game, the Wildcats allowed the Longhorns to battle back. K-State finally prevailed, 30-26, when Mimick added a dramatic final kill to seal the win for K-State.

It was another team effort for the Wildcats with four K-State players scoring double-doubles. Senior Lisa Mimick led the way for the Wildcats, tallying 20 kills and 14 digs.

"It's easy to have a good game when our team is playing this well," Mimick said. "Gabby is throwing up a great ball and we are playing very well together as a team."

Guerre fell just one dig short of her first career triple-double. The freshman finished with 10 kills, 46 assists and nine digs.

Fritz said it was good to see the team play well as a unit against a tough team on the road. With the season coming down to the wire, all matches are important to the Wildcats from here on out, she said.

"This is the first in a tough stretch, and we just want to pay attention to them one at a time," Fritz said. "We wanted this one badly, and now we prepare for the next one."

Men look for final tuneup before opener

BY SEAN PURCELL

Kansas State Collegian

With one last tune-up remaining before the start of the regular season, K-State will look to use tonight's game against NBC Thunder as a learning tool.

After the Cats' first exhibition game, a 58-57 loss to the Global Sports All Stars, players and coaches both know the team still has a lot to improve before opening the regular season against Troy State next Friday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

"We've added a lot of things since the first game, both offensively and defensively, so we will see if we have improved our base and become better with what we need to do every day to be an effective team," head coach Jim Wooldridge said. "It's the same approach as the last game, but there is more of a sense of urgency with this one, though, to see where we are in terms of improvement because there is not another exhibition game. It becomes the real thing after this

But adequately preparing for the regular season doesn't necessarily mean winning the exhibition games, junior forward Matt Siebrandt said. Although the team and fans would rather see a win to ease concerns of whether this team has improved over last season, Siebrandt said it's more important for the team to work on its game and improve in small steps.

Boucher finishes 4th in tournament; Women's golf team ends fall season

BY DAN SMITH

Kansas State Collegian

The K-State women's golf team finished in the better half of a 16-team field earlier this week at the Edwin Watts/Palmetto Intercollegiate Golf Tournament at the 5,873-yard Kiawah Island Oak Point Golf Course in Kiawah Island, S.C.

The Cats, ranked 45th in the country by Golfstat, began the tournament with a seventh place score of 314 in Monday's first round, paced by Christine Boucher's two-over 74.

The sophomore entered the competition ranked 41st nationally and finished the round tied for fifth place.

Junior Elise Carpentier shot a first-round 78, and senior Edie Murdoch fired a first-round 80 to round out the Cats' top three from Monday's play.

On Tuesday, K-State improved in both rounds but failed to move up the leaderboard, holding steady in seventh place behind solid performances from both Murdoch and Boucher.

Murdoch jumped 11 spots from her first-round 38th position to finish tied for 17th by shooting a team best 76 in the tournament's second round and a 77 in the final round.

As a team, the Wildcats finished 22 strokes off the pace of tournament winner Louisville (909), but Boucher's overall score was just four strokes short of Tulane's Carolin Landmann and Louisville's Cindy Pasechnik for the individual title.

Manhattan gets funky with Flybox

Flybox soaring high, CD set to release

BY JJ DUNCAN

With influences in hip-hop, metal and reggae, it would be impossible to work up a fat-free groove.

After months of anticipation, Flybox will release its debut album, "Unhealthy Fattening Canoes," tonight with a compact disc release party. The CD includes seven tracks from the Manhattan band.

Drummer Brandon Noone, junior in graphic design, said the band will be playing everything on the album as well as some new material. Noone said he hopes people are excited enough to pick up the CDs they will be selling.

"Hopefully, they'll respect that we did it all locally," he said. "It was mastered and mixed here in Manhattan."

"And I hope they notice the diversity. We're trying to mix it up by being a funky band but keeping that hard edge."

The album was recorded at J.D. Gilmore's Mourning Wood Studios earlier this year. Noone said working in the studio has made them all better musicians, but the live show is still what they focus on the most.

"Our live shows will always be better," he said. "We make it high energy and keep the crowd involved in what we're doing."

Tracks from the album already are getting attention, Eric Hoopingarner, music director for KSDB FM, 91.9 said the station has been playing "Pulling Together" on the air recently, and it has received good listener response, being one of the top 10 requested tracks for the past few weeks.

Hoopingarner, junior in public relations, said the station just began playing another track, "Bigshot."

"I like it a lot," he said. "With the samples, the rapping, the instrumentation and the quality of recording they've done with a local studio, they've done a pretty good job."

The quality of the musicians and the sound that disc jockey Nick Aglerian adds should grab the attention of those who listen to the album, Hoopingarner said.

"They're all really good musicians, and no other local bands have a DJ to my knowledge," he said. "I dig that stuff. They use the hip-hop element, but I wouldn't call them a Pornotory rip-off by any means."

Fatback and Odds Even both will open the show. Tom Wooldridge, drummer for Odds Even, said Flybox and Odds Even often play together, one opening for the other, depending where the show is. Wooldridge said he always looks forward to playing with Flybox.

"They're a lot of fun to play with on the road," he said. "It's always a good time on and offstage. They always have a good vibe."

"We like the response our crowd gives from when they open for us, and we like the response put out."

Wooldridge said Odds Even has been together for just more than a year, and the group has been performing with Flybox off and on since July. The band soon will be going into the studio to work on its own album, but for now, demo CDs will be available at the show.

Though Wooldridge said he hasn't listened to the CD yet, he said he knows all the tracks from live shows, and he thinks response should be good.

"I'm hoping for a really fat crowd and that they have a lot of fun and buy CDs," he said. "I've heard all the songs on the CD, and I can't wait to get a copy myself."

Noone said he wants people to show up early enough to see the first two bands because all the bands are worth catching.

"A lot of times our fans will come out to see us, but I want them to come to see the opening bands, too because they deserve the attention," he said.

Members of Flybox will be on the Wildcat 91.9 local music show at 7 tonight to release two more edited tracks on the air, Noone said. The band hopes to have a stronger turnout than many shows in Manhattan, such as the recent Pornotory CD release party, Noone said.

"Our goal is to have over 200 people show up," he said. "We want to get more people than showed up for the Pornotory show. And if we can do that, it's a good thing because they're an established band from here."

"We have to look up to them and Ultimate Fakebook and Ruckabarak because they remind us that we have to put our time into this to get to this level."

ALUMNI CENTER

campus organizations will be able to use meeting rooms and board rooms. Private meeting rooms will occupy the remainder of the center.

Lake said she is most excited about a memorabilia room and the library. These will house mementos of K-State's history and yearbooks from each year, which are available at the present site. But Lake said she thinks they are not utilized as much as they could be.

"Where we're not accessible, people don't come and look," she said. "I think word will get around, and it will be a lot easier for people to stop in and look at stuff like that."

She said parking will not be abundant, and staff members will park in the West Stadium lot. That way, parking will be for the center's visitors or for a particular event, she said.

The three-floor building, constructed of limestone, also will have a banquet facility and a media or technology center.

The KSU Alumni Association also hopes to work more closely with the K-State Student Union. Sidener said, having the Union do catering and some janitorial and light maintenance work.

The two facilities also will work to share a reservation software program, which would allow the association to reserve rooms using the Union's same system.

Although students will be able to use the association's rooms at the new site, Tim Harvey, senior in animal science, and Travis Self, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine, said they probably will not utilize the building any more than they do the present one — not at all — but said they might be interested to see some of the memorabilia.

"I'll go in and take a look maybe — just out of curiosity," Self said.

Harvey said he thinks the new site probably will be better for alumni who come back to visit.

"If it's on campus, they can walk around and look at other things," he said.

Sidener said he is excited to work more closely with the university, the Union and the administration.

CREDIT CARDS

Student Union is the KSU Alumni Association. At KU, Mills said, its Union administrators can approve any solicitors' presence at their discretion.

Gayle Spencer, K-State coordinator for student activities and services, said any credit card solicitor on the K-State campus must be accompanied by a representative from a student group. Spencer receives requests from the groups to have the fund-raising events on campus.

"We only have about one credit card solicitor a week," she said. "I have always seen this as a problem.

Walking on campus, it is very easy for students to get credit cards. I realize they are adults and can make their own decisions, but it is hard if you don't have any money and see a credit card stand as an easy way to get money."

Barker said he thinks the solicitors' presence on campus is a valid complaint.

"These groups can be a hindrance," he said. "It is like they are invading private property and are trying to get you to sign up for their cards."

"Until we find that there is strong support for a dismissal for these groups on campus, though, Senate will take no action."

There will be circumstances when students abuse credit cards, he said, but the majority of students are responsible with their financial decisions.

"The best thing is to be informed when filling out the applications," he said. "We will pursue our efforts to make sure they are informed about the negative aspects of credit card use."

"But if students want to stop and sign up, they can. If not, I don't think they are obligated."

do you feel a longing for more in your life?

IS GOD CALLING YOU AND GETTING A BUSY SIGNAL?

do you radiate joy?

do you long to follow in the footsteps of Jesus?

In today's world, it's so easy to lose sight of why we're really here. So perhaps the thought of devoting your entire life to God has never crossed your mind.

Then again maybe it has. Maybe you're one of the rare women who are being called by God to follow in the footsteps of Jesus. And if you'd only take a moment to really listen to your inner voice, God will get through.

We are the Sisters of St. Joseph, an international order with roots right here in Wichita. And we invite you to come live a life of holiness, in a community where we strive for unity and reconciliation among all people with God and with one another. Ours is a community of prayer and service. Our dedication to God motivates us and is the source of joy for all that we do.

But how can you know if you truly have been called? Do you feel a longing for more in your life? Do you feel a void in your heart? Do you radiate joy? Does love pour out of your smile and do you long to follow Jesus?

If so, you owe it to yourself to answer God's call. To learn more about The Sisters of St. Joseph, call or visit us online. You'll be eternally grateful you did.

Bush calms nation's terrorism fears, predicts alliance victory

BY SONYA ROSS
 Associated Press Writer

ATLANTA — President Bush assured an uneasy nation Thursday night that the United States will prevail against terrorists and said Americans should not give in to exaggerated fears or passing rumors.

In a prime-time address, he told Americans to turn their fears into action — volunteer in hospitals, schools, homeless shelters and at military facilities or train for emergency service work and join a new civil defense force he hopes to build.

"We have entered a new era. This new era requires new responsibilities — both for the government and our people," the president said.

Nearly two months after the hijacker attacks in New York and Washington, D.C., Bush conceded that his administration does not know who unleashed anthrax in the U.S. mail. Nor did he offer hope that U.S. troops soon would find Osama bin Laden and unravel his Afghanistan-based terrorist network.

But he confidently predicted victory abroad — "We will persevere in this struggle, no matter how long it takes to prevail" — and lauded Americans for their actions so far.

"We are a different country than we were on Sept. 10: sadder and less innocent, stronger and more united, and in the face of ongoing threats, determined and courageous," the president told a crowd of 5,000, most of whom were police, postal workers, firefighters and other uniformed public servants.

He was interrupted by applause more than 25 times in his 32-minute speech.

The loudest applause came at the end, when he praised the actions of passengers who fought with hijackers aboard United Airlines Flight 93 before it crashed into a Pennsylvania field. Bush recalled the words of Todd Beamer, a 32-year-old businessman and Sunday school teacher, who was overhead on a cell phone to say, "Let's roll," as passengers charged the terrorists.

"We cannot know every turn this battle will take. Yet we know our cause is just and our ultimate victory is assured," Bush said. "We will no doubt face new challenges. But we have our marching orders: My fellow Americans, let's roll."

The address was billed as an update on the war in Afghanistan, the anthrax scares at home and the new responsibilities of government and all Americans. He also outlined actions the government has taken to strengthen homeland security, including deploying National Guard troops to airports and giving law enforcement authorities more powers.

"None of us would ever wish the evil that has been done to our country, yet we have learned that out of evil can come great good. During the last two months, we have shown the world America is a great nation," he said.

Students question rate hikes

BY SARAH BAHARI
 Kansas State Collegian

Business and engineering students say they are not sure a proposal to increase only their tuition is fair.

"I understand where they're coming from. They need stuff. They're not getting done what they need to do," Andrea Williams, senior in marketing, said. "But I don't think they should be singling us out. I don't think that's fair."

To compensate for continuous budget shortfalls, the administration has drafted five proposals that would generate revenue by increasing tuition.

One of the plans includes a split structure, which would require students taking business or engineering courses to pay an additional $10 per credit hour and students enrolled in upper division courses to pay $20 more per credit hour. There also would be an across-the-board 5.5 percent increase each year for the next five years and an additional $75 technology fee.

The increase would go into effect in August.

While nothing is set in stone, Terry King, dean of the College of Engineering, said this is not an unusual practice.

"It's not uncommon for engineering students," he said. "And given our current salary structure, we desperately need some infusion."

It is justified for a couple of reasons, King said. It costs more to pay the faculty and run the labs, and typically, engineering students make more money after graduation.

The average starting salary for an engineering student ranges from the upper $30,000s to the low $50,000s, depending on their specialization.

On the other hand, social work graduates start at about $24,600. Economics graduates earn $33,500 and biology graduates earn $31,200.

Kevin James, senior in mechanical engineering, said that although some students eventually might make more than others, that doesn't necessarily justify the imbalance.

"We might make more later," James said. "But right now, there's not much difference between me and an education major."

Williams said she agreed.

"Hey, we're not making any more money right now," she said. "What about pre-med, pre-law? They'll be making plenty of money, too."

Still, King said the college is having a hard time keeping up with its peers.

University hires new Peace Corps representative

BY OLENA NIKOLAYENKO
 Kansas State Collegian

Throughout his college career at Edinboro University in Pennsylvania, Michael Romaniszyn knew what he wanted to do when he graduated.

"From the ninth grade in high school, I knew that I wanted to join the Peace Corps," Romaniszyn said. "I felt I could make a difference in the world by helping others."

Romaniszyn recently landed a job as a Peace Corps representative at K-State.

"The job keeps me connected to the university," Romaniszyn said.

Romaniszyn meets with students and faculty, clubs and student organizations to share his stories of travel, adventure and community service as well as available Peace Corps opportunities.

"An experience like the Peace Corps is difficult to put into words because there is so much to it that you simply don't get in a classroom," Romaniszyn said. "The Peace Corps really is the toughest job you'll ever love."

Romaniszyn began his career in the Peace

Corps in 1966. After a three-month intensive training program in Philadelphia, Romaniszyn was sent to India. He said he had never been abroad before, except Canada.

The first thing that struck Romaniszyn was the difference in the climate.

"When I landed in Bombay at 4 a.m. after an 18-hour flight, the temperature was 115 degrees Fahrenheit," Romaniszyn said. "It was so hot that everybody wanted to get back on plane because it was air-conditioned."

Together with four other Peace Corps volunteers, Romaniszyn had to forget about the comfortable in America and adopt a simpler lifestyle.

"We stayed in a mud hut with a thatch roof and slept on rope cots," Romaniszyn said.

As for food, Romaniszyn said rice and curry was on their menu three times a day.

Life abroad helped Romaniszyn gain a better understanding of his own culture, he said.

"I am so grateful for my Peace Corps experience because it truly makes me appreciate America and so much that we take for granted here," Romaniszyn said.

Stationed in the Madras area, Romaniszyn taught a variety of courses at a local college.

"Students in India learned more by rote memorization than by hands-on application," Romaniszyn said.

"I dealt with it by theory and practical application methods."

Besides teaching, Romaniszyn was responsible for opening a small clinic in the village Poonamallee.

"Building a small medical clinic in Poonamallee was a rewarding experience because it brought health care and community service to the village," Romaniszyn said.

Upon completing the program, Romaniszyn went back to Pennsylvania to teach high school English. His interest in education and other cultures led him to travel to Southeastern Asia, Central America and Europe.

The Peace Corps was the brainchild of former president John F. Kennedy, who challenged a new generation of Americans

Controversial Senate bill denies funds for Vet Med tutoring

BY ALYSON RALETZ
 Kansas State Collegian

Personal attacks and under-the-breath comments encompassed late-night debates surrounding a controversial bill at Thursday's Student Senate meeting.

Senators argued over but passed a bill that allocated more than $240,000 from the Kansas Board of Regents-governed Educational Opportunity Fund. The fund is intended to aid campus programs and scholarships that serve underrepresented groups.

A College of Veterinary Medicine tutoring service was the only group out of 27 items that senators felt deserved more funding.

Representatives from the college have visited with senators during the past two weeks, asking them to allocate any funding to the group.

"The committee spent seven and a half hours working on this," said Brandon Kauffman, student body vice president and EOF committee chair. "We didn't make any irrational decisions."

Some senators did not trust the decisions the committee made. After three and a half hours of heated debates and four proposed amendments, Senate passed the bill as written offering the service no funds. All four amendments, which would have allocated at least $400 to the group, failed.

Danny Callahan, Faculty Senate representative, proposed an amendment that would have taken money from a Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week scholarship to fund the tutoring service.

"This is a difficult decision," Callahan said. "I didn't mean to attack one group of people, but 400 Vet Med students, to me, is more important than one person getting a $500 scholarship."

Kyle Barker, student body president, argued against the amendment.

"I applaud the effort of an amendment, but first of all, it is a bad idea to take it out of this fund," Barker said. "I feel for the Vet Med Center, but this is a year of cuts."

Hale Library not opening Saturday due to repairs

Hale Library will be closed Saturday. Ed Heptig, interim director of facilities maintenance, said KPL will be doing work at the Southwest Substation. Several buildings on campus will be transferred to another circuit, which will bring more power to the library, as well as the rest of campus.

Heptig said it isn't possible for the north substation to support the entire campus.

As a result of the work, Hale will not have power or chilled water.

Heptig said the upgrade is something that needs to be done, and they picked what they thought would be the most convenient time to do the work.

"We picked what we hoped would be the least critical to the campus," Heptig said. "There's an out-of-town game, so people aren't coming to campus for that reason."

The library will reopen at noon Sunday.

Police not releasing info on former student's death

Police still are not releasing information on the murders of a former K-State chemistry graduate student and his wife in Tucson, Ariz., University of Arizona officials said Thursday.

Jianqing Yang, 32, graduate student in chemistry and doctoral candidate at the University of Arizona, and Yu Yun Chen, 33, homemaker, were found slain at their apartment Nov. 3 after their 6-year-old daughter called 911, said Wayne Addickes, assistant department head of chemistry for the university.

"The problem is, we know very little," Addickes said. "Police have said for investigative reasons, they're not releasing information, which has frustrated a lot of students."

Still, Addickes said, students understand why the investigation has been hushed.

"A lot of frustration is because he was well-liked by a lot of students," he said. "He was considered to be a bright, able student."

On the night of Nov. 2, Yang and Chen were having a Bible study in their apartment. Their last visitors left at 11:30 p.m., he said, so the murders occurred sometime between then and 9:30 a.m. Saturday.

Yang earned his master's degree from K-State last year, and he and his family lived in the Jardine Terrace Apartments.

Yang and Chen's daughter has been placed in Child Protective Services until family members from China arrive in Tucson.

For now, Addickes said, the university community, which includes about 35,000 students, is coping, although frustrated with the lack of information.

"Everyone's feeling a bit numbed and shocked," he said. "We're pulling together and beginning to focus on what we can do for the family."

NATION IN BRIEF

By The Associated Press

Higher education leaders discuss student visa laws

WASHINGTON, D.C. — University officials fear that the relatively small number of people entering the country on student visas will be singled out as the Bush administration puts immigration laws under the microscope.

Most of the 19 hijackers in the Sept. 11 attacks legally entered the United States with the kinds of visas routinely granted millions of foreigners, including student visas.

About 31.4 million foreigners were given visas to enter the United States in 1999. In the 1999-2000 academic year, 514,723 of were for international students studying in U.S. schools.

"While students may be a visible and vulnerable target, everybody knows — including the president — that 30 million visas a year are issued to tourists and business people," said Allan Goodman, president of Institute of International Education. "That's a much looser system that needs to be tightened up much more dramatically."

Now, Bush says he wants to track foreigners who outstay their visas and keep tabs on students and other visitors so they fulfill the purpose on their application.

Senate bill to strengthen U.S.'s ability to fight terror

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Senate unanimously approved a bill Thursday that would beef up the intelligence services to strengthen America's ability to combat terrorism.

"Our legislation authorizes activities that will rebuild the foundation of our intelligence community so that we can meet the terrorism challenge," said Sen. Bob Graham, D-Fla., chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee.

Sen. Richard Shelby, R-Ala., the committee's top Republican, said, "The war we fight today is an intelligence-driven one to a degree that we have never seen before."

"This war has no front lines, and the field of combat is global," Shelby said. "Wherever terrorists and their supporters can be found, that is the battlefield. Never before have we demanded or have we needed so much from our intelligence services."

Intelligence spending generally is kept secret. But the CIA revealed, after being sued by the Federation of American Scientists, such spending totaled $26.6 billion in 1997 and $26.7 billion in 1998, said Steven Altergood of the federation. Since then, it's been estimated at about $30 billion a year.

ASK THE FINANCIAL PLANNERS

Dear Financial Planners,

I charge all of my purchases on a credit card instead of writing individual checks. Then I pay off my credit card balance each month. Is this a good way to manage my expenses?

Dear Student,

As long as you are absolutely positive you can afford to pay off your balance, your strategy will work. This is a good strategy, because credit card companies give you about 30 days to pay off the balance. During this time, you can be earning interest on your money.

However, if you are not keeping track of your expenses and are not sure you will have the money to pay off your credit card, this can be a bad idea. You might end up having to pay interest on everyday purchases like groceries, fast food and recreation.

Our general rule is to never pay interest for daily living expenditure items because the interest expense simply adds to the cost of the purchase. We do have one recommendation for you: try to earn some interest on your money before paying off your credit card each month. Check with a bank or credit union about using a money market account to earn interest on a monthly basis.

Students divided on tuition hike issue

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

While learning information about the proposed tuition hikes, most students are against a drastic increase, but understand the need for university improvements.

Administrators delivered a presentation explaining the tuition increases at Tuesday's Graduate Student Council meeting.

After the meeting, some graduate students said they were just trying to absorb everything that had been discussed, but they were in favor of some type of tuition increase.

"We need an increase to increase faculty salaries," said Elevertia Vassol, Graduate Student Council president. "It could help make it a cutting edge university and bring us to the next level."

John Dunning, graduate student in music, said of the five proposed plans, he did not think plan A, suggesting a 25-percent increase every year for the next five years, would be the best option for students.

Dunning said he thinks it would be more feasible for students to afford plan C, which suggests a 9.5 percent increase during the next five years.

"I think something more moderate would be the best choice," he said. "A nine and a half-percent increase would suit the economic status of students in Kansas. Most students come from families with middle incomes who live on farms and ranches."

"I think an increase would raise the quality of education for students and faculty, but it really matters who is footing the bill."

If parents are the ones who tend to pay for student tuition at K-State, he said, larger increases might not be a problem.

"But more students are paying their way in school now," he said. "I think we can all agree there should be an increase, but something drastic would have a negative effect on students."

Alicia Gerrie, sophomore in architecture, said she chose K-State because of its low tuition. If she had known tuition might triple, Gerrie said she might have considered another university.

"My main purpose for coming here was because it is cheap," she said. "Tuition shouldn't be that high. It's a state university, not one of the more prestigious ones."

She said she would, however, support a slight increase to help the university.

"There are areas that need help," she said. "But I don't want them to get out of hand."

Matt Yoho, junior in English, said he had to take two years off after high school to save up for K-State tuition. Yoho said he was surprised to learn of the tuition increases.

"It's really disconcerting," he said. "I don't like the idea. How many people are going to be extremely in debt after this five-year run? I am living on the brink of poverty right now."

He said he is concerned about how much more he will have to pay in student loans after the tuition hikes.

"With these increases, we are talking about a difference of thousands of dollars—I'm really going to be in debt after college," Yoho said.

Administrators are looking into their best interests, not the students', he said. Even though they are attempting to inform students by visiting college councils, he said student opinion will not weigh heavily in administrators' final decision.

"They look at students as a resource, like money," he said. "I don't think administrators are really concerned with student opinion. There always seems to be this animosity between the two."

"If they are really hell-bent on getting these increases pushed through, the students are kind of stuck."

TUITION

Faculty salaries at K-State are lower than at KU and many other universities.

Provost Jim Coffman said the two colleges both need additional funds.

"These two colleges are the furthest behind and have the highest salary structure," he said. "These are the colleges we're getting clobbered the hardest in turnover."

Student Body President Kyle Barker said he would prefer all students pay the same for tuition.

"At this stage, we need to stay united as students and not split up that burden," he said. "We should pursue as an entire student body a uniform tuition."

James Wright, senior in mechanical engineering, said he wouldn't have a problem with the increase if the money truly benefited the students.

"It depends on where the money would go," he said. "If they had some plan they were putting up so we actually saw where the money was going, I'd be for it."

If the tuition increases do go into effect, Wright said, attending school would be more difficult.

"I'd come up with the money. I'd find a way to pay for it," he said. "I just wouldn't be as comfortable."

Multiplicity of supplements help Editorial Board cope with life

It is all about stamina. Many students chose to use supplements to assist them in their workouts.

From cutting fat to increasing energy or muscle strength, supplements keep students going. They assist them in their goals for working at an optimal level.

But supplements are not just restricted to voyagers of the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex. We have found each of us uses some kind of supplement to keep us going, to help us put out the daily paper.

Michelle Bertuglia: I use Niagara to wind down at night after a long stressful day at the paper — kidding. I have an IV of coffee dripping into my right arm from the time I enter the newsroom to when I leave.

April Middleton: Cherry Pepsi and several miniature field trips out of the newsroom each day.

Dan Smith: It's copious amounts of Kicia, my girlfriend, that I use to get through the day.

Jessica Pitts: Chocolate ice cream, chocolate chip cookies, chocolate candy bars ... need I say more?

Corbin H. Crable: I wouldn't be able to take 17 credit hours, work as an editor for the Collegian and prepare for graduation without multiple bottles of Diet Dr. Pepper, my favorite carbonated beverage du jour, each day.

JJ Duncan: Supplements? What supplements? Who have you been talking to? I don't use anything. I'm clean. CLEAN!

Jamie Barrett: Verbally abusing my senior staff writers keeps me happy and energized throughout the day.

Chelsea Schmidt: As our editor in chief likes to comment on every day, I keep my health and energy up by drinking at least one juice box a day. Right, Scribner?

Nick Bratkovic: A daily dose of motivation, and a can of Tab.

IMPORTANT INVENTIONS

Modern conveniences can hinder rather than help

Some things are not as they seem. Nearly everyone remembers the story of the Trojan horse. Yet our society accepts new things with arms wide open, failing to examine anything more than skin deep.

College students are especially at risk. While a few realize that beautiful wooden gifts are actually a box of mercenaries, most don't.

Here is the Top 8 Modern-Day Trojan Horses that college students face.

OS = on the surface, IR = in reality

1. Exclusive Contracts.

OS: Universities across the country have signed exclusive, multi-million dollar deals with Pepsi Cola. These universities get $14 million dollars or so to fund all kinds of wonderful things.

IR: After the three-year price moratorium is over, Pepsi can charge students whatever they want for a dose of sugary caffeine. Pepsi will rake the students for far more than the $14 million they deposited.

2. Parking Passes.

OS: Naive students are introduced to a plastic token, which means nothing. By paying $70, a students feel they have taken care of worrying about parking. Most assume if you pay money for something, you are guaranteed something in return.

IR: Parking is like the lottery. Lots of people will play, but only a small fraction win. People are lazy, and everyone thinks they should drive everywhere. Therefore, there is no parking, and everyone complains. Think of it this way — you have a $70 piece of plastic.

3. Student health centers.

OS: Each full-time student pays $84.98 per semester funding Lafene Health Center. Students believe if that they pay $84.98, they are guaranteed to get a quick-fix medical treatment.

IR: College students don't take care of themselves, and this creates a complicated problem. Each sick student walks into Lafene and expects a miracle drug. Antibiotics can only do so much. Listen to your mothers. Take care of yourself. And if Lafene still says you are pregnant because you have a sore throat, maybe we should look at its funding.

4. Pizza.

OS: Yes, pizza. Intoxicated students think late-night pizza is ambrosia. They think of "Shuttle" not as a solution to the parking problem, but a cheap solution for nocturnal cravings.

IR: News flash. Late-night pizza will make you fat. If you wish to avoid the "freshman 15," don't call Gummy's. A "Big Ass" is exactly what you'll have by semester's end.

5. Reserved Student Seating.

OS: Paying 30 extra bucks for ICAT makes students think they will receive superior seats.

IR: Unless you get to the game two hours before kickoff, it's likely you'll have 10 inches of space in the back row. Well, at least you won't get rained on.

6. Credit Cards.

OS: They give lots of free stuff away, and students think that if they provide false information, no harm will be done. Students also feel good about signing up for them because student groups can make money for soliciting for credit card companies.

IR: First, solicitation is annoying. Second, students get the cards and use them irresponsibly. Why do the groups get $5 dollars for every application filled out? Because the credit card company is able to rape the poor students who are not smart enough to avoid the free Oakleys.

7. Cell Phones.

OS: Instant communication. Increased productivity and efficiency.

IR: Unmarked hazard for those lacking coordination. Talking on the phone while trying to complete another task could be fatal.

8. Palm Pilots.

OS: The best organization possible for students.

IR: The newest cause for jealousy. Those who win Palm Pilots in drawings might be grilled by friends who don't have one. Note to self — keep eating soup and win more Palm Pilots.

Embrace good things, but beware of Trojan horses.

Clash of the Columnists

Clash of the Columnists is a weekly rotating series. Each week, two different columnists will write columns taking a stance on an issue presented to them. Clash of the Columnists is meant to inform readers about both sides of the issue. The side argued by the columnist was the side assigned to them.

Tailgating should be crowned the No. 1 invention for college students. It might not be the most useful, but it is certainly one of the most enjoyable.

Tailgating is a multipurpose event. You can eat, drink and be entertained all in one place. For some, it is a competition.

I don't think there's a better way to spend a Saturday morning or afternoon than sitting outside KSU Stadium with your friends, a burger and a cold one. It's like a little slice of heaven on earth.

Next up, the kegerator — a useful invention providing college students with beer on tap in their homes without the mess of a regular keg.

Another plus to owning a kegerator — your friends will think you're cool, and they'll always want to come over to your house to party. On the downside, more friends equals more parties, which equals more beer.

What would a kegerator be without the beer? On the weekends, it seems like beer is the invention most utilized by students. Beer can help you drown your sorrows, relieve stress, socialize or celebrate. There have even been a few studies linking health benefits to beer.

Perhaps the one invention that has become the most useful and most crucial to college students is the Internet. The Internet is a quick and easy way to do frantic research for that term paper you put off until the last minute. It can be a source of entertainment. Message boards and e-mail keep us in touch with our parents, our friends and even our classes.

Sometimes I wonder what K-State students would do without fast food. If it weren't for all the fast food places, I think students in the residence halls might starve on weekends. Although the quality might be lacking, nothing can make up for the convenience.

Plus, fast food actually can be safer than cooking. My roommate is a perfect example of this theory. More than once she has come home from the bars and decided to cook while drunk. More than once she has passed out and left mac and cheese boiling on the stove. For people like my roommate, fast food is the safe alternative to drunk cooking.

A favorite invention was created here at K-State. I think the Powercat logo is a noteworthy invention. The K-State Wildcat logo before the Powercat was, well, really dorky. It looked more like a high school mascot than the symbol of a collegiate powerhouse. The creation of the Powercat has modernized the K-State image.

This column just wouldn't be complete without mentioning of cell phones.

To some, they are a nuisance. To others, they are a Godsend. I agree with the latter. My friends can tell you about the countless times I've lost my keys and had to use my cell phone to call for a ride. I don't know what I'd do without the convenience of my cell phone.

Sometimes they're a blessing. Sometimes they're a curse. Credit cards are the only things keeping some students in college. The advantages of credit cards are numerous. You don't have to carry large amounts of cash, wait in line at the gas station or spend all that time writing out a check. Some cards even give you cash back for your purchases at the end of the year.

But, if you're irresponsible with your credit cards, you'll regret the day you filled out the application to get your free T-shirt. Letting mountains of debt pile up on your cards leads to a poor credit history and years of payments.

Unfortunately, the invention that would be most useful to K-State students has yet to be found. We need a clever creation to solve our Wildcat parking woes. Students still are circling the parking lots on campus in search of parking spots like vultures waiting for their prey. We should focus more energy on finding a solution to the parking problem rather than coming up with new designs for useless campus parking passes.

This is for Mr. Graham. I would like to know what would happen after you are allowed to marry your cousins. What would happen if a guy fell in love with his sister? Or say he falls in love with his dog. I would just like to know how far separated from animals we would be if these laws were destroyed.

To the girl looking for the quality men, quit looking in the frats and bars. Go to the library. We are hiding behind our books.

This is to the people who choose the calls to the Fourum and to the people who call into the Fourum. First of all, don't call in dissing on the Cats and going for the Huskers. Go to Nebraska. Second of all, don't put that stuff in the Fourum. We don't want to read it.

great national opportunity is to preserve forever the good that has resulted," Bush said. "Through the tragedy, we are renewing and reclaiming our strong American values."

He said the country is different — sadder and less innocent, strong and more united — than before the attacks.

He spoke in Atlanta, chosen because it is home to the federal Center for Disease Control and Prevention, the nation's leading disease control facility.

Recognizing in polls a desire by Americans to get involved in the fight against terrorism, the president suggested ways people can serve their country. He urged people to head into careers of service, such as firefighting or police work.

He said people should volunteer to work in hospitals and other places on the front lines of terrorism response, such as military installations.

On Friday, Bush was announcing a dramatic increase in the use of National Guard personnel for airport security, including the stationing of guardsmen at airport boarding gates, an administration official said.

"Many ask what can I do to help in our fight. The simple answer is, all of us can become a Sept. 11 volunteer by making a commitment to service in our own communities," Bush said.

Bush announced that the national service groups created by former President Clinton in 1993 — AmeriCorps and Senior Corps — would provide more than 20,000 government-subsidized volunteers to help police, fire and public health departments and free up the professionals for work on the front lines of homeland defense.

Bush also created a task force on citizen preparedness, which will have 40 days to give him recommendations on helping Americans prepare their homes, neighborhoods, schools and workplaces for the potential consequences of any future attacks.

Bush asked states to help develop a modern civil defense service. The program would be modeled after volunteer firefighter programs, which provide trained, equipped firefighters.

"When I was growing up in the 1960s, everybody knew about it," Romaniszy said. "Today, students are not that knowledgeable about it."

Since 1961, more than 163,000 Americans have served as Peace Corps volunteers in 135 countries. To date, 448 K-State alumni have served in 92 countries.

"On average, 40 K-State graduates join the Peace Corps annually," Romaniszy said.

More than 100 programs cover everything from crop and livestock production to forest conservation plans, curriculum development, and basic nutrition programs.

Every five years, a group of Peace Corps volunteers who served together with Romaniszy in India has a reunion in San Francisco.

"The people you meet in the Peace Corps usually become lifelong friends," Romaniszy said.

BIG RED ROAD TEST

Cats have nothing to lose at NU

I have to admit, I laugh along with him. For those of you who view head coach Bill Snyder as a very grim, serious-all-of-the-time, my view

Derek Boss

composed, temperamental and seemingly unemotional guy — just wait a minute.

His mannerisms on the field might evoke that kind of feeling. Heck, he's no Bill Cowher — always in the referee's face after a bad call, cussing, running his mouth, spitting, et cetera.

His general comments at post-game press conferences — never neglecting to mention the negatives, no matter how large the victory — might give the public the idea that nothing is good enough for the Cats' head man.

Plus, seeing his car parked in front of the Vanier Sports Complex at all hours of the night doesn't help that stereotype (I wonder if he's really got that queen-size bed in his office).

Everyone seems to view Snyder as a perfectionist with less of a light-hearted side than former basketball coach Tom Ashbury.

I'm sorry. That was a bit below the belt.

Seriously, though, in just my third year of covering K-State football, I've grown to be quite amused at Snyder's wisecracks. It's a nice change of pace from the serious nature of collegiate athletics these days.

But during Nebraska week?

I simply was taken aback Tuesday at Snyder's quips. A reporter asked him what he was planning to do with his players prior to the Huskers' Senior Day introductions at Memorial Stadium. Would he turn off the lights in the locker room and tell them to focus on the game, or how would he approach it?

Snyder's reply — "Chutes and Ladders is a game we like to play."

Chutes and Ladders?

The press room burst into laughter, generating anything but uptight feelings heading into Saturday's tussle with No. 2 Nebraska.

Snyder actually had to pause and collect himself before answering the next question, a sizable grin lingering on his face. I'd never seen him laugh so hard.

Now, I've heard a lot of jokes from Snyder in the past, but I never thought I'd hear one before K-State/Nebraska. The past two years, it's always been strictly business.

But then again, I never thought we'd be 4-4. K-State's venture to Lincoln this year will be much different than any other for the Wildcats in the last nine years.

The K-State/NU matchup usually determines the Big 12 North Division crown, and lately, whether the Cats will be bowl-in' come Jan. 1. Over the past three years, Snyder's club had a combined 26-3 record heading into the NU game. It was a contest where everything was on the line. One missed tackle or shanked extrapoint (heaven forbid), could alter the outlook of the whole season.

This year, it's almost like the Cats have nothing to lose.

K-State is sure to blowout both Louisiana Tech and Missouri to wrap-up the season, making them bowl eligible with six wins, so the Husker game is almost just for braggin' rights.

All the pressure is on Nebraska for the first time in a while, and that's in K-State's favor.

I like the Cats in a close one, but one thing's for sure — with that 14-point spread for NU, don't waste your money on the Huskers.

Senior Josh Scobey delivers a stiff arm to Nebraska defensive back Scott Shanle during last year's game at Wagner Field. Scobey finished the game with 72 rushing yards and one touchdown. K-State won the game 29-28.

KSU looks to end Nebraska's home winning streak

BY DEREK BOSS

Kansas State Collegian

Not many teams beat Nebraska in Lincoln.

In fact, the Cornhuskers are 63-1 at Memorial Stadium since 1991 and post the nation's longest home-win streak at 20 games.

That might not bode well for K-State as they face NU on the road this Saturday, a place where the Wildcats haven't won since 1968.

Nor does Nebraska's unblemished 10-0 record and No. 2 national ranking this season.

"I haven't seen all the teams in the country," head coach Bill Snyder said, "but I can't think of anybody that's any better."

Yet, Snyder's club does have a piece of history on its side. Looking past the Husker's home-field dominance, one thing is certain for K-State — it's capable of beating NU.

They've done it in two of the last three seasons.

"It helps — it's a whole lot better than never having beaten them at all," Snyder said. "I think our players understand that they're going to have to play extremely well, just because of how good Nebraska happens to be. But the years that we have won have allowed our youngsters to have confidence in knowing that it's certainly feasible."

Cat fans look back to 1998, when K-State climbed the mountain and ended 29 years of heartache and frustration — downing Nebraska 40-30 at KSU Stadium.

Then, just two seasons later, the purple parted the Red Sea once more, nabbing a 29-28 win over NU amid a snow-covered Wagner Field.

For several K-State seniors, those memories seem like yesterday — but captain Aaron Lockett said he's not letting those victories affect his preparation for Saturday.

"I think the past definitely plays a part in the future, but it's not very predictive," Lockett said. "We know what it takes in order to beat Nebraska, and I think Nebraska has the same idea what it takes to beat Kansas State."

After being plagued by a four-game losing skid this season, K-State is riding perhaps its greatest wave of momentum, having won its past two games by a combined 73 points.

Particularly, the Cats' 42-3 win at Iowa State last weekend pleased Snyder, considering the Cyclones featured the conference's then-leading rusher in Ennis Haywood, as well as quarterback and highly-touted newcomer Seneca Wallace.

Haywood managed just six yards for the game on the ground.

"I think it was more than just a win because we believed that Iowa State was a talented and good football team," Snyder said.

"I think it helped establish a little greater confidence with the youngsters in our program. It allowed us to realize that indeed we are getting a little bit better. We are making a little bit of progress. We are moving in the direction that we've wanted to go all year."

As a result, Lockett agreed the Cats are very confident heading to Lincoln, especially the seniors, who have the chance to accomplish

Wildcats hope passing game will open room for Scobey

BY MICHAEL NOLL

Kansas State Collegian

When K-State's offense and Nebraska's defense meet Saturday, the result will be much like a fault line.

Something has to give.

K-State has rushed for an average of 316 yards per game over the last three games. Nebraska, on the other hand, has kept opponents to just 78 rushing yards per game this season.

So, either K-State will break through the Blackshirt defense, or they will get shut down for short gains and be forced to pass.

The Wildcats aren't holding their breath for the first choice. "They're one of the best defenses in the nation, and I don't know if we can expect to go up there and run against their defense because they play against Nebraska's offense every day, who's the best rushing team in the nation," senior Andy Eby said. "I don't think we can expect to go up there and do what we've been doing in the last couple games."

"I think we're really going to work on our passing game and have that help us out if we want to be successful."

This season, K-State's passing game hasn't been perfect. Quarterbacks Eli Roberson and Marc Dunn have thrown for 142 yards per game, good for 105th nationally.

The opportunity to have passing success exists against Nebraska, though, since the Huskers like to line up with seven or eight people in the box. That means the Huskers defensive backs will be left in man coverage on K-State's receivers, a major senior Aaron Lockett likes.

"I think we match up pretty well," he said. "I've had the opportunity to play against all those guys before, so I definitely know where I stand against them. I think that Brandon has a size factor to make a difference, and Ricky definitely has the confidence and the speed to make something happen."

And the Cat receivers are due for a big day after being overshadowed by running backs recently, Roberson said.

"I was talking to Brandon the other day, and he said that this was the week for us because everybody's thinking we're going to run the ball," he said. "We've got to step up. Those guys are ready to go out there and do something special."

K-State cannot completely give up its bread and butter, though. The Cat running backs and offensive line must make Nebraska commit to stopping the run, Lockett said.

"That's our game plan," he said. "I know we're going to have some wrinkles in it, but hopefully we can go up there and execute like we have the last two weeks."

Success in the running game against Nebraska will require the K-State offensive line to push around a Husker front four that has improved with every game, head Coach Bill Snyder said.

See OFFENSE on PAGE 8

Kelly Glasscock/Collegian

Eli Roberson passes the ball in K-State's 38-37 loss to the Oklahoma Sooners on Sept. 29. Roberson was 4-for-12, with 72 yards and a touchdown last weekend against Iowa State. This weekend, Roberson will face a Husker defense that ranks 17th nationally against the pass, allowing 180 yards per game.

K-State men's team defeats NBC Thunder, breaks exhibition play losing streak

K-State junior Janerio Spurlock has a ball knocked out of his hands by NBC Thunder's Vashon Weaver during the Cats' 74-64 win Thursday night.

BY DEREK BOSS

Kansas State Collegian

K-State's exhibition jinx is finally over.

After seven straight losses in preseason play, the Wildcats got over the hump Thursday night with a 74-64 win over the NBC Thunder.

"This streak of exhibition games — that really needed to be ended this year," junior Matt Siebrandt said.

It did end, as K-State used 25 second chance points and outrebounded its opponent by 20 boards to bounce back from a one-point loss to Global Sports a week ago.

Perhaps more importantly, though, the Cats didn't squander their lead down the stretch — an all-too-familiar occurrence last season, and one that plagued K-State in its opening exhibition loss this year.

Trailing the Thunder, 49-38, with 12 minutes remaining, the Cats went on a 14-0 run to take their first lead of the game, as freshman Nick Williams scored six back-to-back points in that stretch.

"He hasn't even touched what he can do," head coach Jim Wooldridge said.

Then, during the final timeout of the game and K-State up six, Siebrandt and senior Travis Reynolds took control of the team huddle.

"With three minutes left, me and Trav were like, 'Hey, this is usually where we fall apart. Make sure it doesn't happen,'" Siebrandt said. "I think everybody knew in the back of their minds that we can't let it happen again, and I think we took care of business."

In fact, the Cats hit 4-of-6 free throws from that juncture, and Siebrandt scored four of his 16 points to help K-State hold on to a 10-point victory in front of 3,788 at Bramlage Coliseum.

A victory was anything but certain in the first half, however. The Cats shot 25 percent from the floor and trailed by as many as 12, before rallying to a 29-26 deficit at the break.

"I was just in shock — total shock — that we came out and played like that," Wooldridge said, though the Cats rebounded to shoot just under 50 percent in the second half, and outscored the Thunder 48-35 in the period.

Senior Larry Reid matched Siebrandt with 16 points for the purple, while center Pervis Pasco added 11.

"I think the kids needed a win," Wooldridge said. "They need to feel good about going into the regular season because it's about upon us."

The Cryptquip is a substitution cipher in which one letter stands for another. If you think that X equals O, it will equal O throughout the puzzle. Single letters, short words and words using an apostrophe give you clues to locating vowels. Solution is by trial and error.

In the play "Lost in Yonkers," Bella (Valerie Dykes) listens to her nephews, Arty (Donovan Seay) and Jay (Jeremy Gibson), explain why they cannot have ice cream sodas before dinner. Bella is a little slow and helps take care of her aging mother.

'Yonkers' to debut tonight; displays unique relationships

BY JENNIFER FARR

Kewanee State Collegian

Defining the family is an issue at the center of the play "Lost in Yonkers." The play, written by Neil Simon, opens tonight at the Manhattan Arts Center. Director Maggie Jackson said "Lost in Yonkers" is Simon's attempt to define what drives the heart of a family, while making the audience laugh through their tears.

"We all have strange relatives, and I think this play allows you to find yourself, while discovering who these characters are deep down inside," Jackson said.

Set in 1942, 15-year-old Jay (Jeremy Gibson) and 11-year-old Arty (Donovan Seay) are sent to live with their German grandmother (Edith Hinrichs) in Yonkers, N.Y. After their mother's death, their father (Charles Faulk) goes bankrupt. The boys reluctantly stay with their grandmother for 10 months while their father struggles to pay off a loan shark.

Although it seems their grandmother's idea of fun revolves around degrading the rest of the family and hitting them over the heads with her cane, the two boys find out all she wants is someone to be honest with her. All of this fits into the constant theme of wanting approval in a family, said Valerie Dykes, graduate student in adult and continuing education.

"This whole play deals with a struggle of approval within a family," she said. "I think the characters that we play will naturally bring out a side of us we didn't know we had. Aunt Bella brings out my childlike side. She is so fun and so innocent, yet she knows more about the world than her family gives her credit for."

During their 10-month stay with their grandmother, the two boys meet the more interesting characters in their family. Aunt Bella, their gangster Uncle Louie and wheezing Aunt Gert all have meaning in the play.

By meeting these characters, they find out unmentioned family history and discover something new about themselves, Jackson said.

Gibson said that throughout the play some of the characters find out that people are not who they seem to be on the outside.

"The biggest conflict my character has is with his Uncle Louie, because, in short, Jay is fascinated by him," Gibson said. "He makes this sort of connection that on the outside Louie is a tough-guy, real hard-ass and really, is just a big old softie and not the survivor he portrays himself to be. This is when Jay's whole perspective is changed."

Jackson said the biggest challenge for the cast was the time limitations of having only four weeks to prepare. Most plays are allowed six weeks for practices.

"I think we have a very good cast and they've handled it well," Jackson said. "They've come in ready to work and they've related to their characters very quickly. And, I think the audience will find themselves smiling through their tears."

Grandma (Edith Hinrichs) tells her son and grandsons why she is opposed to her grandsons moving in with her.

Annual GoldenEye tourney set for this weekend

BY GABRIEL BREAZEAL

Kewanee State Collegian

Participants in this year's third annual Licensed to Kill 2001: "GoldenEye" Tournament will infiltrate the K-State Student Union on Saturday. Each participant will fight for their video game lives to become this year's tournament champion.

The event runs from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. in the Union's Courtyard, and so far, 165 people are expected to participate. Competitors will face off on several game stations throughout the courtyard. Arenas, preliminary, double elimination and tournament championship rounds will make up the day's schedule. The final round will be displayed by video projection.

The champion wins a trophy and polo shirt from the event. Last year's champion was Mark Martinez, sophomore in construction science. He is returning this year to compete again.

"I was surprised I won," Martinez said. "I just didn't expect it. I just went in to have fun."

He said that this year, he is not going into the competition cocky, but stands a good chance of taking the title for a second year.

"GoldenEye" is a Nintendo 64 video game released in 1997 and is based on the Bond movie of the same title. Locations and characters in the game mirror the movie.

The best thing about the "GoldenEye" game is that it's a simple game for beginners to pick up, which can lead to defeating unsuspecting veterans, said Travis Weigel, Her Majesty's Secret Service director and event organizer.

"No matter how well or how badly you end up playing, just remember to have a good time," Weigel, senior in political science, said. "Perhaps some more useful tips would be to keep moving, always have a clip loading, body armor is your friend and be sure to keep an eye on your six."

David Pham, junior in mechanical engineering, said that when he was a freshman, the "GoldenEye" game was part of his life. Now, he seldom plays.

"You have to choose between the game and your girlfriend, and divide the time. If time is left, you pick up the controller," he said.

When he does play, he always is trying to better his opponents, and competition is why he enters the tournaments, he said.

Weigel organized the "GoldenEye" tournament three years ago, during his freshman year, after a friend mentioned a tournament for the game would be a good idea.

"During my sophomore year, I became a resident adviser, and was setting up a small tournament just for Mariatt Hall," Weigel said. "Someone told me that it would be a waste of time to make it any bigger, and that there wasn't really all that much interest."

"Well, I think I have officially proven them wrong for two years in a row, and it'll be three years come 2002."

Her Majesty's Secret Service started this year due to growing interest in the tournament. HMSS is a general Bond game player club. It was able to get video game companies, entertainment companies and local businesses to contribute a total of $4,500 worth of prizes and game gear for this year's tournament, Weigel said.

"Next year, with the new Bond film coming out in November, we're going to try to arrange a sneak preview with MGM," Weigel said. "Also, we'll be looking to bring speakers that would discuss espionage, and due to recent events, these speakers would probably be well attended. And as for the tournament, all I can say is that it will be even bigger next year."

The planning for this year's tournament began last February, and planning for next year's tournament will begin Monday, he said.

"For me, GoldenEye is very relaxing, and is a huge de-stressor," Weigel said.

"I mean, after all, what better way to unwind after a long day than to run around destroying things on a video game. And besides, if the game does become stressful you can always just shut it off. Now, if only real life was that easy."

Hale starts search for Mert

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

"The Gongfarmer" will make the jump from the pages of the Collegian to Hale Library today.

Hale, in conjunction with Randy Regier, creator of the comic strip Where's Mert?

The first clue: "Open doors are better than coffee when you need to cram. We are the gatekeepers." For more information and weekly clues, visit www.lib.ksu.edu.

find Mert will be rewarded with a $100 prize.

The first clue will be published on Hale's Web site today, at www.lib.ksu.edu, and clues will continue to appear on a weekly basis.

Those participating in the contest then must describe and identify the service point in the library to which they are led. Clues will be published on the Web site on a weekly basis and will continue until Dec. 7.

Sara Kearns, business and economics librarian for Hale, and Daryl Youngman, coordinator of library service assessment, had approached Regier, senior in art, about the possibility of using the comic strip to promote Hale.

"We spoke with Randy Regier about developing a series of ads or comics, and he thought it would be fun to take it a step further and make a game out of it," Kearns said.

Youngman said he thinks the contest will be a good way to show K-State students that one of KSU Libraries' main goals is to serve the campus.

"We want to create a library that truly serves the needs of KSU," Youngman said. "The 'Search for Mert' will raise awareness about the benefits of actively communicating with the libraries.

The more feedback we receive, the better we can plan and budget for the improvements that the users need."

Kearns said she agreed. "Our basic goal is to show library users that we listen and act upon their requests," she said.

Regier, who has penned "The Gongfarmer" for the Collegian's arts and entertainment page since spring 1999, said he has enjoyed working with Hale and that he is pleased to assist with the contest.

"This will benefit my strip in that it will force four or five more people to read it, most notably people associated with Hale and responsible for its reputation," Regier said.

"If Hale feels that they have gained anything at all from this, that would be good enough for me."

NEBRASKA

yet another "first" for K-State in its history versus Nebraska.

"Since I've been here, we're 2-2," Lockett said. "I think this would be the opportunity for the first class to come through Kansas State in a five-year period to go out victorious against them as far as a 3-2 record, and I think that's something we've definitely got to take a lot of pride in."

But, K-State's veterans won't be the only ones energized. Saturday marks Senior Day for NU, as 23 Huskers play their final games for the Big Red.

Snyder said his team doesn't have much choice in avoiding that gala of emotion, as over 73,000 cheering fans are difficult to circumvent.

"The problem is, there's no place to hide there," Snyder said. "I mean, you can hear them wherever you are. You could be five blocks down the road and you're going to hear them. You can be in the locker room and hear them."

"But, we'll stay with our routine. We'll be doing our thing. We have things minute-by-minute that we do, and where in that we'll be, I don't know, but we'll do what we always do."

Senior linebacker Ben Leber said he hopes the Cats do what they can on the field as well. He can't imagine a better feeling than upsetting NU, completing what might arguably be the best turnaround in a season over the last 90 years of K-State football.

The 1911 Cats lost its first four games before winning four in a row and earning a 5-4-1 overall record.

"I think it would be a great way to cap it off," Leber said. "And then, we go into our last two games and hopefully come out with wins, and turn this whole thing around and get to a bowl game."

"That would just be the greatest feat in the five years that I've been here."

"Their interior and exterior defensive linemen have really grown into their positions so very, very well, and are playing very well right now," he said. "I think that has helped their defense considerably."

The Huskers defensive linemen might be good, but they aren't super-human. They're just regular football players, Eby said.

"I've played against them the last three years. They're just like everybody else. There's nothing special about them," he said. "They're really good players, but they just happen to play for Nebraska, which happens to be one of the good teams. I've played against really good players this year, and I don't think they'll be any different."

In the end, the Cats must capitalize on the few holes that the nation's fifth-best defense gives them.

Roberson said.

"With their defense, you look at the stats, you can't really run the ball that well on them, and people don't pass the ball real well on them," he said. "We've just got to go up there and play ball. If they give us a hole, we've got to break it open or pass the ball on them."

supplementing MUSCLES

Energy, fat-burning pills help some students lose weight, others gain shape

BY NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

When Ryan Markvicka started working out three years ago, he said people used one or two workout supplements at the same time.

Now, he said, he sees people using up to six or seven supplements at once.

"Everyone wants a shortcut," said Markvicka, employee at ProFitness in Aggieville.

"People hear one thing, and they think they have to have it. They'll come in and say, 'I heard my friend lost 20 pounds on this.'"

He said the most popular supplements right now are fat burners.

"We can never keep those in," he said.

There seems to be a workout aid for every desire: fat burners to drop pounds and get cut, protein to maintain muscle mass, creatine to add energy and pounds, amino acids to increase endurance, ZMA (a zinc/magnesium combination) to increase muscle strength, pro hormones for assistance with muscle density, and the list goes on.

The market for supplements started to boom after word spread that androstenedione, a testosterone-booster, powered Mark

McGwire's 1998 homerun pursuit. In reality, every person is affected differently, and some supplements are dangerous or ineffective, Markvicka said.

"There's two products right now that are not banned yet, but when studies are done, they're more than likely going to rip them off the shelves," he said.

Brent Anders, graduate student in psychology, has read many books about workout strategies and said unless there's at least a 10-year study on a product, people should be hesitant.

He said most men go through the same cycle.

"As a teenager, everyone reads about it in a magazine, and boom, they start taking supplements. Then, a baseball player takes something, and they take it. When they get more into it, they read more books and realize they only need to take about one supplement," said Anders, who has given fitness counseling to about 10 people over the past couple years.

Body builders will use multi-vitamins, a high protein/low carbohydrate diet, a protein supplement and meal replacements to get their muscular look.

almost four years.

Anders said the interest in supplements will stick around for a while, especially in Manhattan.

"It is a college town. There's more people in their late teens and early 20s. More people are becoming aware that they need to work out to stay healthy. When there's more emphasis on looking good, there's more use."

"It's definitely a learning experience."

Women, he said, usually are only interested in fat burners, so they don't go through the cycling.

With all the hype, Anders said, there are many misconceptions. He said supplements should serve as a small additive.

"Supplements are just that — a supplement. The key to that is that it's an aid to a logical type of workout with proper rest and stretching. You can't depend on a supplement," Anders said.

Anders said he's tried almost everything, and while he saw benefits, now he just takes protein and a multi-vitamin.

"I'd say I've gotten to the point where I can recognize things better. When a new supplement comes out, I don't just read a magazine. I've learned to do more reading than just that," he said.

Yet, an end to the supplement craze isn't in sight.

Cody Claassen, sophomore in milling science, said that as technology advances, results from supplements will improve.

"I think that the market is going towards things like pro hormones, andro — things more close to steroids," said Claassen, who's used supplements for

Bush pays tribute to veterans 2 months later

BY RON FOURNIER
The Associate Press

NEW YORK — President Bush returned to the World Trade Center's smoking rubble on Sunday, two months after the Sept. 11 hijackings.

In a Veterans Day tribute, he called on Americans to remember "the terrible harm that an enemy can inflict" as they reflect anew on the sacrifices of their nation's military.

The commander-in-chief said attacks on New York, Washington and Pennsylvania deepened the nation's debt to soldiers who fight abroad and police and firefighters who serve at home.

"The great purpose of our great land ... is to rid the world of evil and terror," Bush said at a Veterans Day breakfast as he thumped the lectern.

"Evil ones have roused a mighty nation, a mighty land. And for however long it takes, I am determined that we will prevail. And prevail we must, because we fight for one thing — and that is the freedom of our people and the freedom of people everywhere."

Several hundred veterans, uniformed soldiers and police jumped to their feet and filled a cavernous military armory building with applause. The speech, Bush's first Veterans Day address as president, included his only public remarks on the final day of his two-day U.N. visit.

He met privately with the presidents of South Africa, Argentina and Colombia before attending a U.N. ceremony at the site of the collapsed twin towers in lower Manhattan.

It was Bush's first visit to the site since Sept. 14, when he waded into the ruins with a bullhorn in one hand and an American flag in the other.

"I can hear you," Bush told hundreds of weary rescue workers in one of the more memorable moments of his presidency. "The rest of the world hears you, and the people who knocked these buildings down will hear all of us soon."

At the breakfast, Bush said the Sept. 11 attacks rekindled respect for police and firefighters.

"Whenever an American hears the word police or fire, we think differently. We think differently about the job," Bush said. "We think differently about the character of those who serve on a daily basis."

He flashed the Port Authority Police Department badge — No. 1012 — that belonged to George Howard. Howard, who rescued an elevator packed with children during the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, died in the Sept. 11 attack.

Howard's mother, Arlene, gave the badge to Bush in September. She attended Sunday's address.

"In a time of war, we look a little differently at our veterans, too," Bush said. Veterans Day tributes are "made with a little greater feeling because Americans have seen the terrible harm that an enemy can inflict. And it has left us deeply grateful for the men and women who rise strongly in the defense of our nation," he said.

"This nation is freedom's home and freedom's defender. And we owe so much, so much to the men and women, our veterans, who stepped forward to protect those freedoms."

HOUSING HOPE

Habitat for Humanity creates homes, happiness

BY NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

Walls, a roof and a new address might be the apparent benefits of a Manhattan Habitat for Humanity house. But for the homeowners, the benefits are far greater.

What stems is a sense of pride. "The pride it instills in people that this is their home, it helps them in all aspects of life," said Elise Lambert, executive director for Manhattan Habitat for Humanity. "It raises self-esteem. And working with the volunteers, they realize they are a part of the community."

Both future homeowners and about 30 community members worked together Saturday at 1918 Lincoln Drive to help construct the program's 11th house. The future homeowners are a young couple with a 2-year-old son and a child on the way.

"They're just a young couple trying to get on their feet," Lambert said.

The groundbreaking for the lot was in October, and Lambert said they hope to complete the house in late spring.

When finished, the house will have three bedrooms, one full bathroom, a basement, two exterior doors and an outdoor storage unit. It also will be furnished with a refrigerator, oven and garbage disposal. Plus, each Habitat family is allotted a $1,000 allowance for the house. Most, Lambert said, use the money to have air conditioning or a half-bath installed.

"They are very basic, basic plans," she said.

Nicole Frakes and her son Anthony Dodson share a hug in front of their new home being built by Habitat for Humanity. Volunteers, as well as the home owners, worked Saturday by sweeping leaves out of the basement, hauling and sawing wood.

Availability limited for flu vaccine

BY KECIA N. SEYB
Kansas State Collegian

Students who do not have certain health conditions will have to wait to receive flu vaccinations from Lafene Health Center, which received one-tenth of the vaccine doses it ordered.

The center will receive the full 1,500 doses it ordered, but Jay Reppert, medical director of Lafene, said he doesn't know when.

"It should be in by the first of December," he said, "but we don't know for sure."

For the last two years, vaccine manufacturers have had troubles growing the virus, he said.

"You have to culture the virus to produce the vaccine," Reppert said. "If it doesn't grow as rapidly as you think it will, then it puts you behind."

Chuck Murphy, director of Riley County Health Department, said the problem exceeds the plants, going to suppliers who don't want to make more doses than they can sell.

"It's always hard to guage how many doses to produce when they're not sure how many batches are going to be successful," Murphy said.

Health experts are saying until a larger supply becomes available, those with asthma or other lung disease, heart disease, diabetes, kidney disease, blood disease or immune system disorder will be eligible to receive their flu vaccinations first.

Females who will be in the second or third trimester of pregnancy during flu season — November through April — also will be eligible.

Sandy Werneke, health nurse at Mercy Health Center, said Mercy received its full dosage — 500 doses — about a month ago, and she has been giving doses for a couple of weeks.

"A lot of our employees who are students have been getting them," she said. "I've seen an overall increase in people getting them. I think it's probably because they were so hard to get last year."

Mercy only gives flu vaccinations to its employees and volunteers for free, she said, but she encourages others to get vaccinated.

Community runners race around campus, win prizes in annual Flint Hills Fall Classic

BY KECIA N. SEYB
Kansas State Collegian

The people running around campus Sunday were not running because they were late to class.

They were a part of the 2001 Flint Hills Fall Classic, a 5,000-meter race, timed by Flint Hills Harriers, which started and finished at Ahearn Field House and included about 180 participants from ages 9-70.

Kinesiology students organized and ran the event, giving away door prizes, including a basketball signed by the women's basketball team and a football signed by several members of the football team, such as Bill Snyder, Joe Hall and Josh Scobey.

The door prizes and music, provided by Complete Music, created an enjoyable atmosphere making the race fun, said overall male winner, Pat Melgares, 34, who won with a time of 16:22.

"I really compliment the kinesiology program," he said. "It was really well-organized, and the environment with the prizes and the music just made it a fun race to be a part of."

Melgares, graduate student in agriculture communications, said he competes in several races around Manhattan and does well, typically finishing third or fourth in his age group. His wife ran the race last year, and the two have to decide who will run and who will watch their three children, ages 6, 4 and 2, each race.

Melgares runs five or six days a week, running 40-45 miles a week. He said he cut back a little this week to prepare for the race. "It's a tough course. It's really hilly on the north side," he said. "I was really happy with the time because it is really hilly."

The race, beginning at Ahearn, went up Denison Avenue, around the agricultural unit, down Mid-Campus Drive and ended once again at Ahearn, Randy Cole, cross country coach said. He said a couple of his runners competed, running it easy, since they had a meet yesterday.

"A couple did it for extra credit for their kinesiology class too," he said.

Different departments around campus competed for having the most participants and the three fastest times, Christine Ferguson, teaching technician for the kinesiology department, said. This year, the English department takes it, she said.

But, Melgares said he hopes his department wins sometime.

"We want to take that traveling trophy away," he said.

Mercy Hospital won as the business with the most participants and fastest times.

CAMPUS IN BRIEF

Freshman wins 3rd annual 'GoldenEye' tournament

Jeremy Julian, freshman in computer science, won the Licensed to Kill 2001: "GoldenEye" Tournament on Saturday.

The competition began at 9 a.m. and lasted most of Saturday in the K-State Student Union Courtyard with 120 people in the tournament. Her Majesty's Secret Service, a K-State organization based around the game, sponsored the event and gave away numerous prizes.

This is the third year in a row for the competition. Event organizer Travis Weigel, senior in political science, said there are plans for the event to continue.

Julian said he thought he was out of the tournament early because of the close competition. After he was awarded first prize he said he was lucky.

STATE IN BRIEF

By The Associated Press

Dry southwest weather turning Kansas wheat blue

HUTCHINSON — An unusually dry fall is turning some wheat in southwest Kansas blue, agriculture experts say.

"Some areas out here got some moisture in mid-September. If they planted their wheat before then, it's in pretty good condition. If it was planted later, it's pretty spotty," said Dean Whitehill, Kansas State University Extension agent in Finney County.

Whitehill said some of the drought-stricken wheat has taken on a "bluish" color.

"That means it's not in real great shape," he said. "Much of it doesn't have enough crown root to anchor it down for the coming winter months."

National Weather Service meteorologist Jim Caruso said Hutchinson received just 0.64 of an inch of rain in October. The average rainfall for the month is 2.42 inches.

Meteorologist John Finch said the Dodge City area got its last significant rainfall — one inch — on Sept. 15.

Anthrax causes relocation of Washington post office

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Postal officials have moved Washington's central post office to another building after finding widespread anthrax contamination.

The Postal Service moved mail-processing operations from its Brentwood facility to a location on V Street in northeast Washington Saturday.

Officials discovered the Brentwood facility is so badly contaminated that it will probably take months to destroy the anthrax, which has killed two mail handlers, made 20 others sick and shut down several congressional buildings that got their mail from Brentwood.

The decision to move the facility was rushed and was not widely discussed with city officials or within the Postal Service itself, The Washington Times reported Sunday.

U.S. war costs could reach up to $1 billion each month

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A U.S. helicopter lost in Afghanistan a week ago cost up to twice as much as the government spends yearly on scenic byways. Each cruise missile is worth several American homes.

The total expense of the Afghan war might be nearly as hard to find as people hiding in Afghan caves. By one estimate, the military assault is costing $500 million to $1 billion a month — and above the $1 billion in promised U.S. economic assistance to Pakistan and debt relief for the country.

The Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, a private research group that closely examines the cost of war, offered that monthly figure. Precision is impossible without knowing more about how many bombs are being dropped and what is happening with U.S. forces on the ground, among other variables.

Still, parts of the war are adding up — the estimated $5,000 an hour to fly a Navy FA-18 fighter-bomber, the $25,600 cost of one of the frequently used Joint Direct Attack Munition bombs, the top-of-the-line Tomahawk cruise missiles.

Bush: U.S. looks toward peace in Israel, Palestine

WASHINGTON, D.C. — "Palestine" entered the U.S. government lexicon with President Bush's speech to the United Nations.

Secretary of State Colin Powell said Sunday that it reflected the administration's vision of two states, Israel and Palestine, side by side.

Until now, U.S. officials have referred to the possibility of a "Palestinian state," but have never called it "Palestine."

Powell said Bush's use of "Palestine" in his speech Saturday was deliberate.

"If one is moving forward with a vision of two states side by side," Powell said on NBC's "Meet the Press," "it's appropriate ... to call those two states what they will be, Israel and Palestine."

Bush told the U.N. General Assembly that the United States is "working toward the day when two states — Israel and Palestine — live peacefully together within secure and recognized borders as called for by the Security Council resolutions."

junior in agriculture communications

CAMPUS Post Card

Courtney Wimmer

Courtney Wimmer, junior in agriculture communications, was selected as the September student of the month for the College of Agriculture out of about 15 nominees.

Wimmer said she was surprised at receiving the distinction. "I was really surprised," Wimmer said. "It's an honor out of the whole college, and I hope what I have done and continue to do will reflect this honor."

Each of the 25 clubs in the College of Agriculture has an opportunity to nominate a student. Once nominated, a student/faculty panel from the College of Agriculture votes on the recipient based upon service in the club and overall grade point average.

Those who are named student of the month are eligible at the end of the year to be chosen as student of the year for the College of Agriculture and receive a $500 scholarship.

Dr. Kevin Donnelly, assistant dean of the College of Agriculture, said this provides students an opportunity to be recognized for their hard work.

"I think this provides students a way to be recognized who are not necessarily involved in campus-wide activities but are involved nonetheless," Donnelly said.

Special Olympics Fall Classic teaches life skills through competition

BY MICHAEL WATSON
Kansas State Collegian

Nearly 1,400 athletes across the state competed for top volleyball and bowling honors Friday and Saturday at the Special Olympics Fall Classic.

Walter Gill, from the Capper Snappers team in Topeka, said he was going to win the bowling tournament Friday in the K-State Student Union. He said bowling is his favorite event.

"I have been bowling forever," he said. "I bowl as much as I can. My average is 116."

Adrienne Folkerts, vice president of public relations, said the slogan of Special Olympics Kansas is Training for Life. People with mental retardation are encouraged to discover the true meaning of courage, determination and sportsmanship, both on and off the playing fields.

To do this, they have to leave the sidelines and compete themselves, she said. Competition is important in Special Olympics. It is what they look forward to. She said the competition teaches them about life.

"We don't just teach them sports. We teach them skills for life," she said. "They have friends, and we teach them public speaking. They become well-rounded."

Gill said the tournament keeps him busy, and he has made many new friendships at different tournaments.

"It's a lot of fun. I have a lot of friends," he said. "Meeting people — I love doing that."

Teams also battled one another at Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex on Friday. Aaron Cudenkauf and James Franklin said they have played volleyball for the Topeka-Shawnee team for three years.

"It's fun to play volleyball,"

Franklin said. "We get to hang out with friends."

After the day of sports, the athletes put on their dancing shoes and danced the night away in the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

Gill said he was looking forward to the dance. He said he hoped they would play his favorite kind of music.

"I like M-E-T-A-L," he said. "I'm going to dance."

Folkerts said the dance is a really big deal to the athletes.

"If they didn't have the dance, there would be a riot," she said. "The dance is such a big deal. They get to see friends they see once a year."

More than 15 groups from K-State volunteered at the bowling and volleyball competitions. Groups included Pre-nursing, Phi Eta Sigma, Alpha Chi Omega, Big 12 Council and Kappa Kappa Gamma.

Audrey Yong, freshman in agriculture communications, said she volunteered through her leadership studies class.

"I walked in and was like, 'wow. This is neat,'" she said. "I think it will be a lot of fun to help people. Everybody here is so friendly."

Young said it was her first time volunteering. She sat back and watched everybody for a while before getting involved. In leadership studies, her teachers told her what was going on, but they really didn't teach her how to deal with people with disabilities.

Tim Rehder, vice president of sports and competition, said the event would not be possible if it weren't for the volunteers.

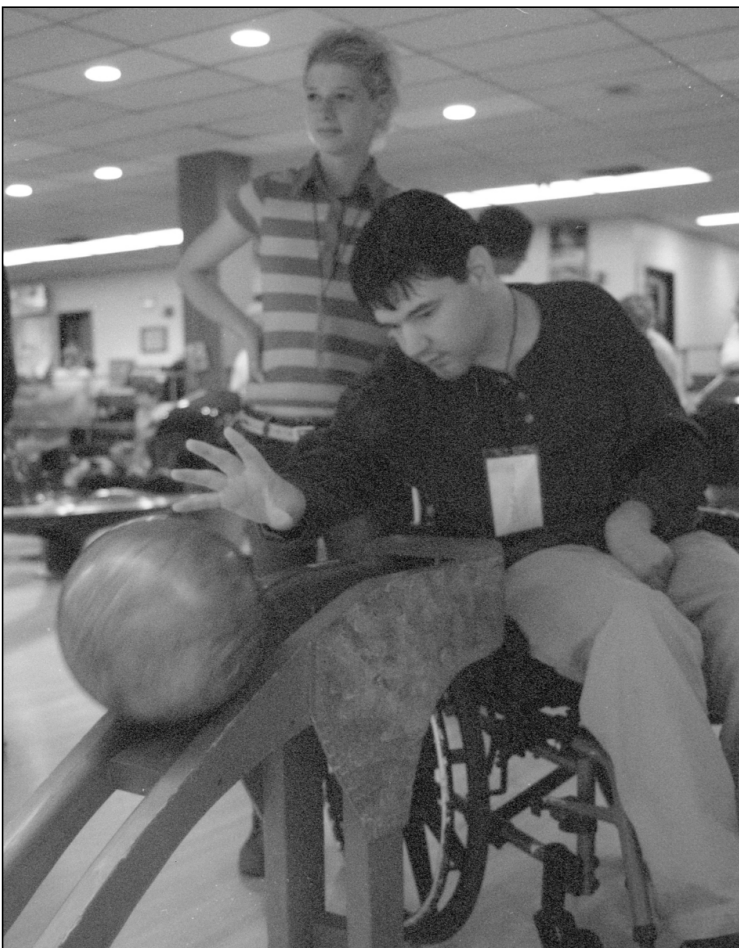

"We would like to thank all the volunteers. They are the driving force of the Special Olympics," he said. "We wouldn't be able to do this if it wasn't for them."

This is the second year for Special Olympics to be in Manhattan. Before it was just two events. Once the two events were brought together, Manhattan was a good place to hold the event, Folkerts said, because the Rec Complex is a wonderful facility.

She said next year they hope to expand the event to five sports to include Bocce, equestrian and golf. Bocce is lawn bowling.

Special Olympics involves year-round sports training. The next big event is the winter sports competition that will include skiing at Snow Creek, figure skating and hockey.

"I'm into ice skating, so I do that," Coopersmith said. "Oh, yeah, looking forward to the Winter Olympics."

Governmental Awareness week offers information on state, national politics

BY TREVOR BURGESS
Kansas State Collegian

The first Governmental Awareness and Public Service week will begin today and continue throughout the week with various activities.

Booths set up daily inside the K-State Student Union and also outside in the food court will provide students with information about the government and public service.

Spencer Stelljes, governmental relations chairman, said these booths will serve the students at K-State greatly.

"These booths are meant to serve the students on campus to allow them to find out how to contact their elected officials," he said.

There also will be some public service booths set up such as Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc., American Red Cross and March of Dimes, among others.

Stelljes said the Governmental Relations booth will be a great asset to the week's activities.

"The Governmental Relations booth will have access to a Web site that will allow students to come and tell us their zip code," he said. "With this zip code, we can find out their state-elected officials and national-elected officials."

Stelljes said this will be a great chance for students to contact these officials.

Aside from the booths, there are two big events during the week. There will be two forums that students are invited to attend. The first one is at 1 p.m. Wednesday at Forum Hall. Stelljes said at this forum there will be a local community leader and some state-elected officials present.

The second forum is at 1 p.m. Thursday in the Union Courtyard. This will include some K-State leaders and administrators speaking on what service means to them. At the end of the forums, students will have a chance to ask questions.

While this is the first Governmental Awareness and Public Service Week, Stelljes said he thinks this week will be of great service and hopes to make it an annual event.

"The purpose of the week is so that students can find out how to serve their communities or their state or national governments," he said. "While this is the first year for the event, we would definitely like to make it a yearly event."

Students find new, deeper meaning in Veterans Day after attacks

Today is Veterans Day. For many in our generation prior to Sept. 11, the day had little bearing. Veterans Day always had been a day to celebrate the efforts of those who had stepped up to the line of battle to defend our freedoms, but they were freedoms we took for granted. This day suddenly has a very new, profound, deeper meaning for many of us. In a speech at the site where the World Trade Center used to stand, President Bush said in times of war we look at our veterans differently. He said, "It has left us deeply grateful for the men and women who rise strongly in the defense of our nation." He also reminded us how much we owe those who stepped forward to protect our freedom. Now more than ever, it seems important to reflect on those who sacrificed their lives for us, for our freedoms. If you get a chance today or this week, take part in a Veterans Day ceremony. Or reflect on how lucky we are that others have sacrificed themselves for our freedoms.

Does anybody have any advice about what I can do about my roommate who watches dating shows all day long?

Why was there a guy riding his bike through the Derby this morning?

I just tried to give myself a headache. It hurt bad. Don't do it.

Hey, if cheerleading isn't a sport, how come they have national competitions every year in Dallas? Somebody does win.

I was just wondering what does "H to the izzo, V to the izza" really mean?

If cheerleading is such a sport, then who is the greatest cheerleader of all time?

Yeah, right, cheerleading is a sport like golf is a sport.

This is to the guy who pulled me in when I passed out on his front lawn and was puking, took me into his house and let me pass out on his stairway. I appreciate that.

To the girl who wanted to know where all the quality men are — they are all at K-State-Salina.

Wanted — a roommate that is not a manifestation of all that is irritating.

Beware of the dancing hamsters.

Does anybody have a roommate you are ready to get rid of? We do.

Student recounts grievances, problems with Manhattan

Editor,
City Planning Symposium.
OK. Let us create a city built around a college campus, a three square-mile place where roughly half of our population of 50,000 commutes to and from daily. We should provide no easy way for them to get there: no mass transit, rugged, neglected streets with inappropriately reduced speed limits and stop lights purposely timed to force us to stop, and we'll put a stop sign or roundabout to navigate at every other possible intersection. When the bumper-to-bumper cars actually begin moving, we should place crosswalks every 100 feet and allow students to jump out in front of this traffic. To make it ultimately frustrating, we should provide inadequate parking when they get there so that drivers invade in the local neighborhoods (homeowners won't mind — especially on gameday when we're charging $5 per car at the stadium). These neighborhood streets will have no sidewalks and with cars parked on both sides, traffic is reduced to one lane. My daughter will need to walk out into this mess to go to her friend's house a few doors down. She will pass several rental units where tenants have furniture in their lawns and have left their party cans and trash out in the front yard for their unchained pitt bull, "Tough," which is an extension of their manhood, to rummage through. They insist he won't harm anyone, but I tell her to keep her distance and keep an eye on him. She blasts Britney Spears on her headphones to drown out the barking. While she is watching the dog, one of the tenants turns onto my street and punches the accelerator because he's cool like that. Unlike my daughter, a squirrel, munching on an acorn, hears the car and scurries up a tree, catching the eye of our neighborhood cat who provides chase, catching the eye of the junkyard dog who runs after the cat, catching the eye of my daughter who would like to get out of the way of this fascinating display of nature's food chain, but the wall of parked cars prevents her escape. None of this has yet caught the eye of the freshman in Daddy's Mustang roaring 60 mph down a one-lane neighborhood road with his sunglasses on at 8 in the morning because he drank too much beer last night. When the cops question him, he says he was aggravated because he was trying to get a parking ticket voided by the witch in the parking services department with the chip on her shoulder. She's probably married to the City Planner, and together, they do their best to make life in Manhattan miserable and dangerous for everyone.

TEAM EFFORT

Tips for group projects eliminate frustration

Group projects. Two simple words that can make every college student groan in disgust.

About this time of year, the computer labs are filled with a group of students that is tense and huddled around a single monitor.

We're there at all hours of the night and day trying to work together and accommodate everyone's schedule.

We create e-mail Listservs and phone trees so everyone will show up after changing the meeting about 15 times.

We're there to earn a class grade, but we're also learning in the process-learning about ourselves, about the subject and how to handle all kinds of people.

Whatever way your group was formed, the process is like playing Russian Roulette — nobody knows exactly what he or she is going to get.

However, a few assumptions can be made: there will be a slacker, an overachiever and a person with a continuous conflicting schedule.

A company that specializes in team unity and effectiveness, Team Management Systems, has a few technical terms for these folks: reporter-advisers, creator-innovators, explorer-promoters, assessor-developers, thruster-organizers, concluder-producers, controller-inspectors and upholder-maintainers.

If you're really an overachiever, or a thruster-organizer, you can pay Team Management Systems to evaluate your group and make it more effective.

Or, you can look at the advice it gives for free.

The April 1996 issue of Fast Company magazine offers a few tips college students can use to cut down on group meeting time and the frustrations that follow.

— Take meetings seriously.
— Meetings generally last too long. They should accomplish twice as much in half the time. Almost every guru invokes the same rule: Meetings should last no longer than 90 minutes.
— Don't let people wander off the topic. It's the starting point for all advice on productive meetings: Stick to the agenda. But, it's hard to stick to an agenda that doesn't exist, and most meetings in most companies are decidedly agenda-free.

— Convert decisions at the meeting into action. People leave meetings with different views of what happened and what's supposed to happen next. The best way to avoid that misunderstanding is to convert from "meeting" to "doing" — where the "doing" focuses on the creation of shared documents that lead to action.

— Embrace anonymity. Too often, people in meetings simply don't speak their minds. Sometimes the problem is a leader who doesn't solicit participation.

Sometimes a dominant personality intimidates the rest of the group. But most of the time the problem is a simple lack of trust. The most powerful techniques to promote candor rely on technology, and most of these computer-based tools focus on anonymity — enabling people to express opinions and evaluate alternatives without having to divulge their identities.

— Meetings are always missing important information, so they postpone critical decisions. Bring the necessary information to the meeting.

— Monitor what works and what doesn't, and hold people accountable.

Businesses Fast Company and Team Management Systems such as these lead me to believe our frustrations with group projects aren't going to end after we graduate.

Apparently, all that mumbo-jumbo about having to work with other people after college is true.

These ideas might work in your next group, but nothing replaces the ultimate motivation — money.

We're not getting paid for the hours we spend on a project. But if we did, the teamwork might not seem so painful.

Body wrapping latest trend for instant-gratification diets

Are you satisfied with your body? If you answered no, you are not in the minority.

We all have problem areas. Whether it is flabby arms, a thick waist or a fat butt, everyone has some bodily feature he or she would like to improve. According to the Federal Trade Commission and Food and Drug Administration, 50 million Americans will diet this year alone.

A survey done by Glamour magazine in 1984, reported 75 percent of women thought they were too fat.

This same survey repeated in 1997 showed an astounding 89 percent of women were grossly dissatisfied with their bodies.

Evidence indicates a growing number of men are dissatisfied as well.

With these statistics, it is no wonder the dieting industry is booming.

Many different diet and weight loss plans are available. It is shocking to see exactly the lengths people will go to be thin.

Everything from diet pills to energy drinks, magic weight loss earrings and appetite suppressing eyeglasses are available for a hefty cost. Do these products work? In the case of the weight loss earrings, the obvious answer is no.

But, other products such as diet pills and energy drinks provide rapid, temporary weight loss.

However, the health and medical ramifications can be severe.

Several different ailments, ranging from destroyed metabolisms to loss of hair are common when these miracle diets are used in excess.

Some of these products are so dangerous, in fact, the FDA recently banned 111 substances previously found in over-the-counter weightloss products. Sounds a little discouraging, doesn't it?

However, a new, supposedly safe, trend in speedy weight loss has been introduced and has spread like wildfire.

This new trend is "body wrapping." While body wrapping experts claim that no actual weight will be lost, it is supposedly able to melt two to 20 inches off your body in an hour.

The process of body wrapping is simple. Your body is wrapped, like a mummy, in elastic shrouds that are soaked in a mineral or herbal solution. The concept behind body wrapping is fat cells and other toxins will be moved into lymphatic systems and then flushed out naturally by your body's water.

This system is not only supposedly safe and natural, but it is claimed to be an easy, foolproof method of looking good in only an hour. Is it too good to be true?

Body wrapping is such a new concept, very little medical information is available on it. Most of the information provided is testimonials from satisfied customers who claim their bodies have been revamped in a mere afternoon.

What does instant gratification of this magnitude cost? Anywhere from $50 to $200 a session. Contrary to advertisers' claims, the American Council on Exercise (ACE) reports a customer must have an average of four sessions before any noticeable results are produced.

Not only will this new fad put a serious dent in your pocketbook, but the ACE also says there is no physiological evidence that this process works. It warns against severe dehydration and circulatory constriction caused by the tight wraps.

Is the risk worth it? That is a personal decision all dieters must make for themselves.

However the FDA warns consumers against any diet product that claims to be miraculously fast, easy or is incredibly expensive.

The trend of body wrapping seems to fit all the warning signs.

It seems the only real way to effectively lose weight safely and is through the ordinary process of reducing calorie intake and exercising.

Although safe dieting and body conditioning will take more than an hour, they can save you hundreds of dollars and perhaps years off your life.

Fad dieting and weight loss trends are generally ineffective and dangerous.

If you, like most of the population, are unhappy with your body, choose your method of improvement wisely.

HABITAT

Each house is funded by donations and built and planned by volunteers.

“Habitat is a can-do group,” said Julia Harbers, volunteer and junior in social work.

“They get things done. They come up with an idea. They find a way to do it, a way to get materials and a way to raise the money. It’s rare you come across a group like Habitat.”

Under this program, owners do not pay any building costs, but they are required to make mortgage payments. But the rates are interest-free for the families.

Lambert said the houses they build help fill an expanding need in Manhattan — a demand for low-income housing.

According to the 2000 Manhattan Housing Study, about 235 affordable housing units will be needed by 2005.

“There is a real need for low-income housing, and we’re really the only low-income builder in Manhattan right now,” Lambert said.

The Manhattan Habitat for Humanity began in 1995, and since then, the need has grown, Lambert said. In fact, Habitat even has a waiting list. However, because it relies solely on donations, it only can build two houses each year. Each house costs around $42,500 to construct.

Tina Meek, a resident of the second Habitat for Humanity house, applied five times before she was accepted. That was in 1998.

“Habitat was very helpful,” Meek said. “It made it possible for me to be a homeowner. I wouldn’t have been able to do that without them.”

She takes great pride in being a homeowner, she said, and to be able to provide a safe place for her children. Before, she and her four children lived in apartments or sub-standard housing.

“The kids had nowhere to play,” she said of the apartments.

“They had to play in the parking lot.”

And the house she lived in was not safe, she said.

“I had a small house with very dangerous basement stairs,” Meek said. “It was very small — very cramped.”

Now, her children have a yard to play in and a safe environment.

“It’s just nice having my own house. I feel like I have more privacy,” she said. “It’s a lot of work, but it’s nice.”

However, homeowners are not the only ones who benefit from the program. Volunteers said they do as well.

“I think it’s a good way to help the less fortunate,” Katy Carter, junior in electrical engineering, said. “A lot of people say college students are apathetic, and this is a good way to show the community we care, too.”

Older citizens in the community pitched in as well.

Ralph Teaforad, a retired electrician, has been volunteering with the program since its second meeting more than six years ago.

“I worked in construction all my life, and I enjoy building. Besides, it keeps me out of the taverns and off the street,” he said smiling.

CLASSIC

“I’d do this any day before I’d go out there and try to put that little white ball in a hole 300 feet away. This is fun for me, just like golfing is for other people.”

Lambert said seeing these volunteers and families work together is her favorite part of the program.

“It brings people of diverse ages, backgrounds, races and religions together,” she said. “It’s really neat to see all these people working together for someone else.”

Besides involving all who wanted to compete, the race also served as the Road Running Club of America’s championship race for the 5ks, Ferguson said. This was the Kansas championship, and next the championship runners will compete nationally.

Jerry Becker, equipment manager for Complete Music, said he and some of his coworkers arrived at Ahearn at 7:30 a.m. to motivate the runners with music. He said he, however, doesn’t run because he’s too lazy.

“We entertained them, stretched them out with a little ‘YMCA,’ a little ‘Night at the Roxbury,’” he said. “We basically got them pumped up to run.”

Melgares said he enjoyed the race tremendously with the terrific weather being an additional benefit.

“The only disappointment is that we didn’t win the autographed football,” he said.

Wildcats lose in 31-21 game to Nebraska

BY DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

LINCOLN, Neb. — About 20 minutes after K-State's 31-21 loss to No. 1 Nebraska on Saturday, head coach Bill Snyder emerged from the K-State locker room after asking his players a simple series of questions.

"I just asked our football team — 'Do you really want to play in a bowl game? Do you want to be bowl eligible? Do you want to have an opportunity to play in a postseason bowl game?'"

The response was positive, but the mood was of a different nature, senior Derrick Yates said, after the loss dropped K-State to 4-5 on the year, two wins away from bowl eligibility with two games remaining.

"We played hard," Yates said. "A whole lot of guys were crying. We played real hard this game and we wanted it, but we made too many mistakes to get it done."

Those mistakes, and a powerful Husker offense, seemed to haunt K-State from the opening moments Saturday, as K-State struggled in its latest attempt to right the ship.

"We got beat by a tremendous football team," Snyder said. "Against a team like Nebraska, you can't do the things that we did and expect to have a chance."

K-State did have a chance early after each team failed to convert on several early-game opportunities leaving the game knotted at 0-0 after the first 15 minutes.

Even after Eli Roberson's 32-yard touchdown pass with six seconds left on the clock put K-State up 14-13 heading into halftime, the Cats still felt good about their chances for the upset.

"We were hyped. We were emotional," senior Josh Scobey said. "We were up 14-13 on the No. 1 team in the country. How much better could it get — in Nebraska?"

"We had everything going our way, and we didn't give up. And coming out at halftime, we were really, really jacked."

But that feeling, and anything that Snyder might have told his troops at the break, didn't stay with the Cats for long as the Huskers got off to a strong start in the third quarter.

After deferring to the second half gave Nebraska the ball to open the third frame, the Huskers used a long drive that ate up 7:19 to take a lead that would stick for good.

"That first series back on the field — I think that's the key that killed us," Yates said. "They had a long drive, and they came out and shoved the ball right down our throats."

"We made some mental errors. We could have stopped them a couple of times but we didn't. I think that was the trademark for the whole game."

But it was the errors K-State's offense made that cost the Cats the most, especially in the passing game.

Nebraska's second score came off an Eli Roberson pass picked off in mid-flight by Husker defensive back Willie Amos, who returned the interception 20 yards to give Nebraska a 13-0 lead with 8:43 to go in the second quarter.

It was Roberson's first encounter with Amos, but not the only time the two would hook up. The sophomore free safety stepped in front of another Roberson pass in the third quarter with the Cats down 28-14 and driving, stopping the Cats' hopes for a comeback on their own 45-yard line.

"I'm very frustrated," Roberson said. "I just gotta go back to the chalkboard and just figure out what I did wrong and just try to turn them into positives."

While Roberson's misguided passes played a large part in the inefficiency of the offense, a lot of the credit went to a LINCOLN, Neb. — A football game lasts 60 minutes, but K-State might have missed its chance of defeating No. 2 Nebraska in the contest's first 12:38.

Despite surging back to take a 14-13 lead at halftime, the Wildcat offense fell short in building a substantial first-quarter lead on the Cornhuskers.

"You've got to take advantage of that," offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said. "Nebraska's good — there's no question about that — but we had our chances, and we did not rise to the occasion in certain situations."

The Cats did have their share of opportunities.

On the opening drive of the game from their own 16, quarterback Eli Roberson led the Cats inside the NU 30, sparked by the sophomore's 43-yard run over right tackle.

But three plays later, K-State would find itself back in its own territory.

Rock Cartwright lost eight yards on second down, as the fullback ran right and looked to attempt a throw-back pass to Roberson. The play never developed.

"Eli ran into an offensive tackle and a defensive end and couldn't get himself out," head coach Bill Snyder said, "so consequently, we don't have a play, because it has to happen relatively quickly, and it didn't. So, that's execution."

"I called it because it was a good play for us to run — we just didn't execute it very well."

Then, on 3rd-and-17, the Huskers came with the blitz and sacked Roberson for a 17-yard loss, pushing the ball back to the K-State 48 and forcing the Cats to punt.

It would take just 1:09 for K-State to regain possession, however.

Jon McGraw's hit on Nebraska I-back Dahrran Diedrick jarred the ball loose, and safety Derrick Yates was there for the recovery, giving the Cats the ball on the NU 20.

But K-State began the possession with a false start and failed to get a first down on the series, and freshman Joe Rheem's field goal attempt was hit low and blocked by Husker Tim Demerath.

"We can't do nothing about that, man," Yates said.

"The defense did our job. We made some turnovers."

Tiger wideout Justin Gage set a school record with 13 receptions for 236 yards from quarterback Kirk Farmer, who threw for a personal best 360 yards and three touchdowns on 23-of-34 attempts. Missouri racked up a season-best 531 yards of total offense and led 34-3 at the half. The Tigers must win their next two games, Nov. 24 at K-State and Dec. 1 at Michigan State, to qualify for its first bowl game since 1998.

TEXAS TECH OKLAHOMA STATE	49 30

Tasteless humor leads to movie's demise

"SHALLOW HAL"

MOVIE REVIEW BY CORBIN H. CRABLE

Last week, my co-workers warned me that "Shallow Hal" would be nothing more than a "fat" joke.

How right they were.

In the movie, directed by the Farrelly brothers, ("There's Something About Mary"), Jack Black stars as the title character, a self-absorbed, shallow man who pursues women solely based on their physical appearances. He has a "miraculous" change of heart, however, when he encounters a self-help guru (Anthony Robbins, as himself) who helps Hal to see the inner beauty of a person.

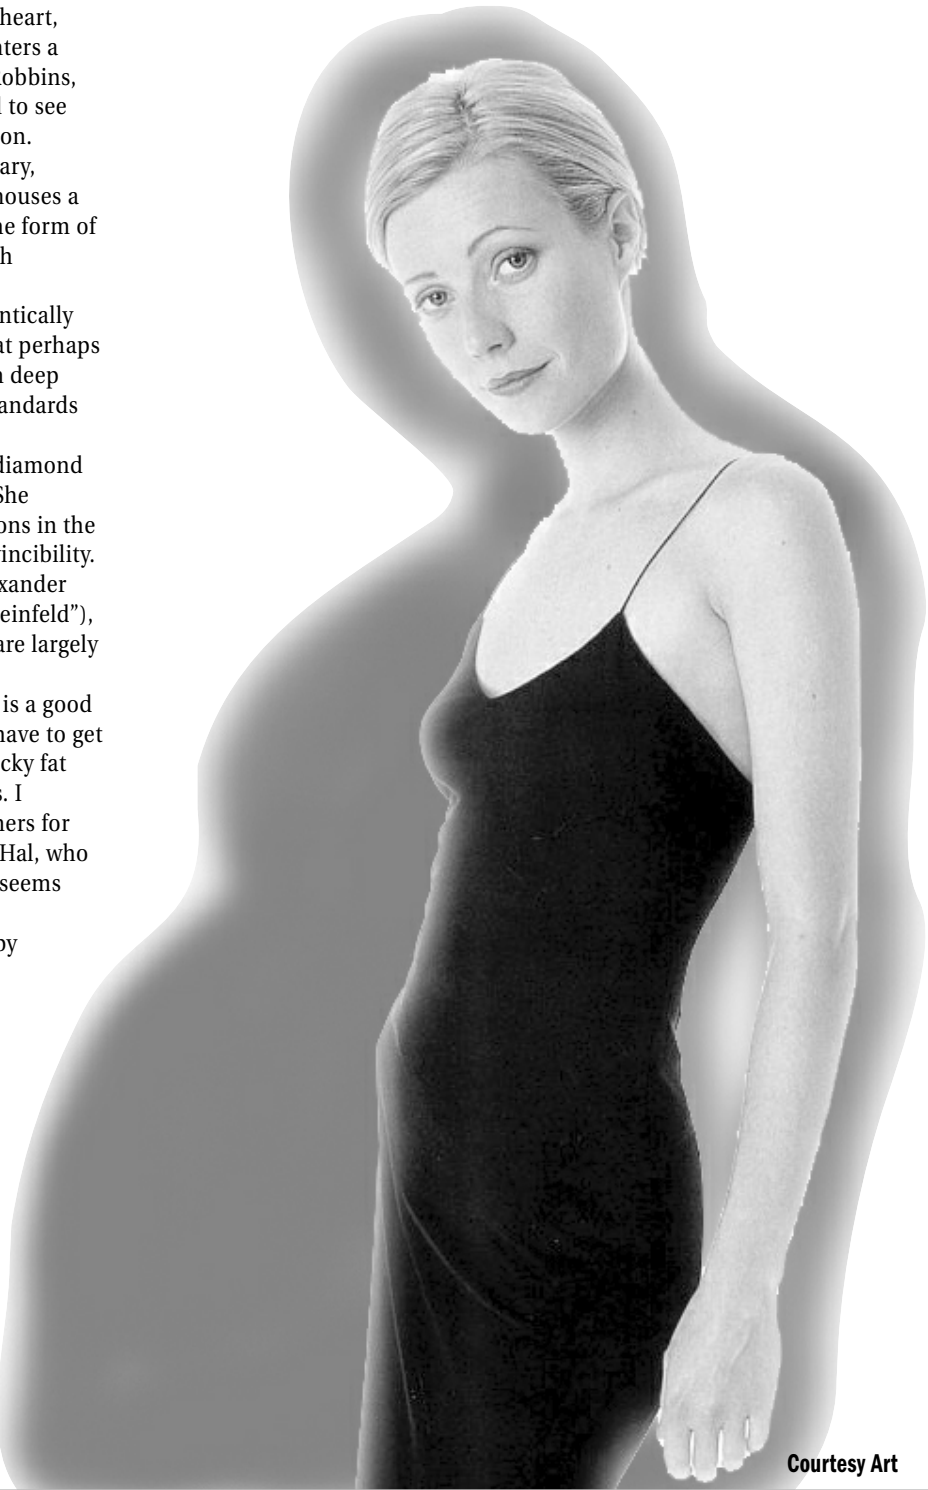

Hal then meets Rosemary, whose 300-pound frame houses a beautiful personality in the form of a slender blonde (Gwyneth Paltrow).

The two become romantically involved, and Hal sees that perhaps beauty is indeed only skin deep and that his unrealistic standards for women are hurtful. Paltrow is the proverbial diamond in the rough in this film. She portrays a range of emotions in the movie with ease and convincibility. Black, and even Jason Alexander (George Costanza from "Seinfeld"), who plays Black's friend, are largely unfunny.

The moral of the story is a good idea in principle, but we have to get to it through a series of tacky fat jokes and tasteless visuals. I applaud the Farrelly brothers for mocking the hypocritical Hal, who himself is no prize, but it seems they think that they can balance out the fat jokes by adding a moral and making everything fine.

I personally was offended by many aspects of the movie.

The larger Rosemary is only onscreen for laughs, and by keeping her in the background merely as a vehicle for comedy, the Farrelly brothers are totally defeating their purpose in trying to show that beauty

Film's poor script robs moviegoer

The only thing interesting about this heist is how the producers are ripping off anyone who pays to see it.

A few good actors don't save the juvenile plot and ultra-cheesy script that busts this "Heist." The movie uses every high-profile-thief-movie cliché in existence and combines each with some of the most one-dimensional double-crossing characters ever seen in film.

"HEIST"

MOVIE REVIEW BY JJ DUNCAN

Joe Moore, (Gene Hackman, "Heartbreakers"), plays an aging jewel thief who heads up a team that works for the gangster Bergman (Danny DeVito, "Man on the Moon"). When the team is going out for one last heist, Bergman sends his nephew, (get this name) Jimmy Silk, (Sam Rockwell, "The Green Mile") along with the team to make sure the prophets are divided evenly.

A script filled with double-crossing characters delivering horrible one-liners ensues in which the gold from the heist plays the central role.

Some characters live and some die, but none of the twists are unexpected or surprising. In fact, most people in the seats probably won't care. Some people in the theater were literally laughing at how ridiculous this movie is.

The most interesting characters in the film are pulled off not by the top-billed names, but by Delroy Lindo, ("The Cider House Rules") and the deadpan Ricky Jay, ("Boogie Nights"). Lindo has a habit of stealing scenes in even the most mundane roles. As one of the thieves, his performance is no exception. Not many people will recognize Jay, but his dry wit as another of the thieves is welcome in a cast where everyone else seems to enjoy talking too much.

"Heist" gets nominally interesting in the few minutes that the thieves are actually stealing things. The plans are well-laid with a team that thinks of everything, but they fail to make the movie fun to watch.

To be as cheesy as the movie, the bottom line is not to let these movie makers heist anything from your wallet.

Local band's distinct sound captured on 1st album

Mixing a plethora of influences into one developed sound, Flybox has released a first album worthy of attention with "Unhealthy Fattening Grooves."

Built on funk grooves, metal guitars, hip-hop vocals along with scratches and samples, Flybox has crafted a sound that, while it is still far from perfected on this album, is distinctly the band's.

The style has an aggressive rap/rock core with a few more grooves than you would find with other bands of a similar nature.

The band leaves a few things evident on its debut release.

First, band members have worked out many of the kinks that plague new bands. Second, they still have a lot to work out.

Many of the songs are well-written and arranged, but it's easy to hear where the recording process eludes the music.

On the album's second single to be released on KSDB 91.9-FM, "Bigshot," the instruments are noticeably separated.

So instead of being the powerhouse song it is live, the recording remains a collection of instrument tracks that doesn't quite come together the way it should. Still, it stands as a decent recording of a good song.

Vocalist Britt Desbien's lightning fast rhymes effortlessly skitter over the top of distorted guitars and scratched records as he conquers songs such as the funky "Words for None."

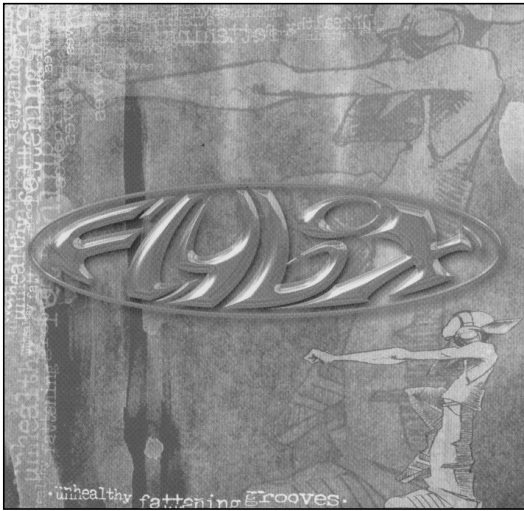

His hip-hop influences bring an exciting sound to the group that makes it impossible to sit still through. Then, he tries to sing.

Unfortunately, Desbien's singing voice just doesn't stack up to his outstanding rap capabilities.

His voice loses a definitive style, and he seemingly becomes unsure of himself as he sings through "Block Your Light."

It might be that the singer just needs some time to find a singing style that appropriately complements his rap side, but the difference in quality is clear on the album.

Aside from occasionally sounding muffled on the album, the instrumentation sounds excellent. Bassist Mike Vallis carries a continuous groove, delivering funk in chunks of slap bass and assertive riffs.

Courtesy Art

Overall this is a band that sounds tight and comfortable together.

This is a band that is quickly becoming a Manhattan staple outfit and after a listen to the album, it's not hard to see why.

The talent the members carry is evident and can only improve with time. Instead of letting the album form your opinion, take an opportunity to see the group live.

Questions about Wildcats’ running game linger

Pulling out of the Memorial Stadium parking lot with my head in a daze after K-State’s 31-21 loss to Nebraska, one pesky little thought just wouldn’t leave me alone — what if the Cats would have stayed with the run game?

Now, to be sure, K-State did rush for 239 yards on 44 attempts against the Huskers on Saturday (just enough to set up another miserable passing day), but I don’t think I was the only Wildcat fan hoping for a couple more Scobey scampers and fewer Ell errors on offense.

Far from ineffective, the Cats made their statement on the ground and should have stayed there longer.

To wit — Josh Scobey ran 14 times Saturday for 38 yards, Joe Hall eight times for 48 yards, Darren Sproles twice for 24 yards. Heck, Ell Roberson himself led all rushers with 119 yards on 16 carries. So, why did offensive coordinator Ron Hudson abandon the run game in favor of a pass-happy attack that sputtered and then completely stopped?

“It came down to matchups,” Hudson said during the postgame press conference. “We had guys open, we struggled with our protection and we just didn’t complete it.”

But the problem with that philosophy, as Nebraska head coach Frank Solich happily found out, is that to take advantage of matchups, your quarterback must deliver the pass accurately and consistently. And for the majority of K-State’s nine games this season, that element has not been part of the Wildcat package.

Roberson went 1-for-11 with two interceptions. Marc Dunn completed three passes out of seven attempts but was also picked off in the fourth quarter.

Still, the game plan remains the same, and for good reason. For a long time, K-State’s passing game has complemented the Cat ground game — but times have changed, and Hudson’s planning must, too.

Unfortunately, that change probably won’t come this year, Hudson said.

“We’re not going to change that,” Hudson said. “We’re going to throw the football.”

K-State’s lack of a presence through the air even has tailback Josh Scobey confused about the system, and rightfully so. Although the senior still is confident the Cats can pull out of their funk, an increase in his workload couldn’t hurt.

“I truly believe in this system and the schemes that they’re putting us in, and I really can’t understand why we’re not as balanced as we should be because we have all the talent, all the tools and all the personnel to get it done, and we’re just not.”

It’s hard to pinpoint a reason for the lackluster performances this season.

It’s even harder to question the staff, especially with the success it has enjoyed recently.

Hudson and head coach Bill Snyder know it. They’re trying to fix it. They know their team’s strengths and adapt their game plans accordingly, but a lack of on-field analysis this season has hurt the Cats and put them in a bind late this season.

Now, with must-win situations facing the team in each of its final two games, the time has come to put traditional planning aside and put the ball on the ground and keep it there.

Husker defense that played one of its best games of the year, limiting the Cats to just 276 yards on the day.

“They’re one of the very finest defensive football teams in the country, but we made some mistakes,” Snyder said. “When a guy in a red jersey receives a pass that a guy in a white jersey threw, the guy in the white jersey isn’t in control over that.”

In fact, Roberson’s touchdown pass was his only completion, finishing the game 1-for-11 with 32 yards and two interceptions.

Those stats and Roberson’s struggle to find the right read under pressure meant a change to backup Marc Dunn in the fourth quarter, but Dunn’s interception with 1:50 left in the game put a lock on K-State’s 16th consecutive loss to Nebraska in Lincoln.

“They made plays when there were plays to be made,” Dunn said.

“We just didn’t down the stretch.”

FLU

"I know with the nice weather, a lot of people aren't really thinking in terms of the flu vaccine. It is going to hit," Werneke said. "A lot of times by this time of year, we've already started getting cold weather. I think we still will — it's just going to be a little bit later this year."

Vaccination information

Those who answer 'yes' to any of the following will be eligible to receive flu vaccinations. Those who do not, should wait until vaccine is more plentiful.

Are you 65 years or older?

Do you have a chronic medical condition yourself (regardless of your age), such as:

- Asthma, or another lung disease?
- Heart disease?
- Diabetes?
- Kidney disease?
- Blood disease?

Do you have immune system problems caused either by disease (such as HIV infection or lymphoma) or by medication (such as chemotherapy or radiation therapy)?

Are you a woman who will be in the second or third trimester of pregnancy during flu season (November through April)?

Are you a child or teenager (6 months-18 years of age) who is receiving long-term aspirin therapy?

Do you live in, or work in, a nursing home or other chronic care facility where some of the residents have chronic medical conditions?

Are you a health-care worker who delivers care to high-risk patients in their homes?

Flu injections will be given from 8:30 to 11:30 a.m. on Thursdays and 1 to 4:30 p.m. Thursday and Nov. 29 at Lafene Health Center, or until the current supply is exhausted.

— Source: Center for Disease Control

Riley County Manhattan Health Department — which received 400 of the 4,000 doses it ordered — is already out of its first batch of the vaccine, Murphy said. He said the department distributed the first batch to the nursing home and other high-risk people.

Healthy students can receive their vaccinations at the health department, he said, but he urges them to wait until the end of the vaccine.

"Since they're young, healthy individuals, we'd ask that they wait," he said. "It's kind of the honor system, but we sometimes screen if we're really short on vaccine."

Murphy said he wants everyone to be patient and realize that although it takes two weeks after the vaccination to develop immunity, there still is time before the major flu season.

"They shouldn't get concerned just yet," he said. "There's still plenty of time."

Influenza spreads from infected people to the nose or throat of others. Symptoms include sore throat, dry cough, fever, runny or stuffy nose, headache, muscle aches and extreme fatigue.

About 20,000 Americans die from the flu each year. The vaccine can prevent the flu and is considered 70 to 90 percent effective.

Reppert said the problems in growing the virus aren't typical, and last year's situation was worse. Lafene has had a number of vaccination requests that it hasn't been able to fulfill, he said, but 150 doses of the 1,500 ordered is quite a difference.

"A big difference," he said. "We're really sorry this happens, but we have no control over it."

"I think every time we were down in the red zone, we should have scored. We should've scored each and every time. We gave the offense plenty of chances to score, but that's just how it goes."

Nebraska took over at its own 20, but the Cat defense forced a quick three-and-out. The purple then drove into NU territory at the 49, but on 4th-and-1, the Cats lined up in an unusual formation — often termed "Polecat" or "The Swinging Gate." The majority of the offense lines up on one side of the field, while the center, quarterback and another player remain on the other.

K-State couldn't get the snap off before the play clock expired, though, and after the penalty, Snyder was forced to punt the ball away.

Still, on the first play of the ensuing NU series, the defense made yet another big play, as DeRon Tyler stepped in front of quarterback Eric Crouch's deep ball and picked it off, giving the Cats possession at their own 38.

But three Roberson incompletions later — one highly overthrown to Aaron Lockett on third down — and K-State had squelched another opportunity.

Tailback Josh Scobey said the missed chances were far too frequent Saturday, especially in that critical first quarter.

"You can't make mistakes against Nebraska in Nebraska," Scobey said. "As good as their defense is, you have to be on all your P's and Q's in order to be successful against them, and we didn't do that today."

Meanwhile, on the other sideline, Nebraska seemed to capitalize on all its opportunities.

The Huskers returned a Roberson interception for a touch-down in the second quarter, got a field goal off another pick in the third and turned trips to the red zone into points on almost every occasion.

In fact, the only time NU didn't score when it penetrated the Cats' 20 yard line was on its last possession, when the game clock expired with Nebraska on the K-State 14.

Linebacker Terry Pierce said it's tough knowing that a few mistakes could have cost the team the win.

"I think if we had taken advantage of a lot of opportunities that we had — I mean, a whole lot of them — it would've been a hell of a different game," Pierce said.

"Way different."

NY plane crash kills 260, cause unknown

BY DIEGO IBARGUEN

The Associated Press

NEW YORK — A jetliner en route to the Dominican Republic broke apart minutes after takeoff and crashed in a waterfront neighborhood in Queens on Monday, engulfing homes in flames and sowing initial fears of a new terrorist atrocity. All 260 people aboard were killed, and at least six others were reported missing on the ground.

"All information we have currently is that this is an accident," said Marion Blakey, National Transportation Safety Board chair. If there was an explosion on the plane — and many witnesses heard one — it was probably caused by a mechanical failure, investigators said.

As night fell, several hundred people working under the glare of klieg lights formed bucket brigades as they separated debris into gruesome piles of luggage, plane parts, house debris and human remains. Police said bodies were being recovered intact; one victim, a man, was clutching a baby.

American Airlines Flight 587, a European-made Airbus A300, left Kennedy Airport at 9:14 a.m., 74 minutes late because of security checks put in place after the World Trade Center attack, according to American Airlines chairman Don Carty. It took off into a clear blue sky.

Three minutes later, it spiraled nose-first into the Rockaway Beach section of Queens — a middle-class neighborhood, 15 miles from Manhattan, that lost scores of its people, including firefighters and financial workers, in the World Trade Center catastrophe just two months ago.

"I just thought, 'Oh, no, not again,'" said Milena Owens, who was putting up Thanksgiving decorations when she heard an explosion.

Furious orange flames towered above the treetops, and a plume of thick, black smoke could be seen miles away.

Authorities found the cockpit voice recorder, one of the two black boxes from the twin-engine jet, and said it would be examined for clues.

Witnesses reported hearing an explosion and seeing an engine, a large chunk of a wing and other debris falling off the plane as it came down.

"I saw pieces falling out of the sky," said Jennifer Rivara, who watched through a window at her home about five blocks away. "And then I looked over to my left and I saw this huge fireball, and the next thing I know, I hear this big rumbling sound. I ran to the door and all I saw was big black smoke."

An engine was found intact in a parking lot at a Texaco station, where it had missed the gas pumps by no more than 6 feet; neighbors ran to the scene with garden hoses to put out the fire. At least part of the second engine was found in a back yard, police said.

The vertical stabilizer — the tail fin — was pulled from Jamaica Bay, just offshore.

Wearing a blue cap with the logo, "97 Infantry Division" and a military jacket, 81-year-old Cecil Eyestone marched along Poyntz Avenue during Monday's Veterans Day parade.

Eyestone, a World War II veteran and 1944 K-State Agricultural College alumnus, remembered his participation in another parade in 1946. He said that November day, he marched along Michigan Avenue in Chicago and passed in review of President Harry S. Truman and General Dwight D. Eisenhower.

Together with other veterans and Manhattan residents, Eyestone came to honor those who lost their lives defending the United States and American values.

"It is also part of an educational effort to create more awareness of what our soldiers have done to keep our country free," Eyestone said.

The parade started at City Park and proceeded east to the Manhattan Town Center.

A variety of bands, floats, schools, veteran organizations and soldiers took part in the annual event.

Francesca Whitmire, mother of a second-grader from Custer Hill School in Fort Riley, joined the procession of 300 students from the first through the fifth grade.

"It is good for kids to feel involved in it, and they are having fun," Whitmire said.

The theme, "Hold High Freedom's Flame," ran as a red thread through the parade. Many students carried red torches and the posters they made for the occasion.

"We had a lesson beforehand when a teacher read a book and explained the history behind the day and why we celebrate it," said Kaye Burgett, teacher at Custer Hill School.

Dressed in Civil War uniforms, the Fort Riley Honor Guard represented itself as part of Kansas history. Everything from the cap to the high boots and the saddles were designed as a reproduction of the 1860s.

"Because Fort Riley was a Civil War post, we often reenact the Civil War training," said Joe McDonald, sergeant in the Fort Riley Honor Guard. "We show our support for veterans and patriotism."

The cheering crowd of spectators on the sidewalk also showed its support for the veterans by greeting them with a round of applause and waving American flags.

Given the long-standing fight for freedom in America, Veteran's Day is equally important for the veterans and the youth.

"We love our freedom, and young people should appreciate the country we are living in," said Gustave Fairbanks, World War II veteran and 1941 Kansas State Agricultural College alumnus.

Credit program helps students manage debt

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE

Kansas State Collegian

College students who are overwhelmed by credit card debt can find hope in Consumer Credit Counseling Services.

CCCS, a division of Housing and Credit Counseling Inc., is a not-for-profit agency designed to help those with money problems and has an office in Manhattan. Credit counselors set up appointments with their clients, who can ask for financial information and advice about managing one's finances and getting out of debt.

Kristin Brumm, CCCS division manager, said those who need additional help getting out of debt can join CCCS' debt management program. It costs $25 to enroll in the program.

"With the debt management plan, we can negotiate with creditors to lower interest rates and forgive over-the-limit and late fees so that the client is able to pay their bills back," Brumm said. "If they do go into the plan, however, they must cut up their credit cards and not use any other credit cards during the time they're in the plan."

The client makes a set, flat monthly payment to CCCS, and that payment then is distributed to his or her creditors.

Brumm said the average college student graduates with about $25,000 in debt, which includes student loans and credit cards. Many students who graduate have to begin paying off both the loans and credit cards find it difficult, she said.

"It's a shocker because the student loans come due, and they have that payment each month in addition to their living expenses," Brumm said.

Kim Rebel, counselor for CCCS, said the Manhattan office is in an interesting position as far as its clientele are concerned.

"We have a lot of college and military clients," Rebel said. "The Manhattan office encompasses Junction City and Fort Riley, too. Basically, we cover the whole vicinity."

A prominent feature of CCCS, Rebel said, is a series of presentations that CCCS representatives give to college campuses in their respective area.

"We hope to get more involved in those presentations because credit card debt with students is growing, and it's something that students need to be educated about," she said.

Brumm said that with many K-State seniors graduating this semester, they will have to look for an apartment or home, and possibly a car. With these new expenses, prospective landlords and car salespeople can check the credit history of the applicant.

It is important, Brumm said, to be honest with a prospective landlord when looking for a new home and to let them know you're working with a credit agency to better your situation. Rebel said she hopes CCCS and its programs and presentations will help students and community members better understand their credit.

"It's so important to speak with college students about things such as interest charges, late fees and understanding your credit mits," she said.

Speaker discusses role of technology,
American society in long-term battle

BY TYNA DEINES

Kansas State Collegian

The recent threats to America will not result in a short term fight, Major John Nagl, said. Rather, he said, it is a long fight that will continue for a long time.

Nagl opened his presentation, "A World of Tiers: Asymmetric Threats to U.S. National Security," by addressing America's current situation.

Nagl presented a slide show illustrating the various points addressed during his lecture Monday night in the Hale Library Hemisphere room.

In reference to Monday's plane crash, he said the public response shows a change in the nation since the attack on the World Trade Center two months ago.

"The mere fact that we're worried about it shows how much the U.S. has changed since Sept. 11," Nagl said.

Nagl said the attack is the latest change in America, and explained how the world has changed through the years, and the changes' effects on the nation.

In 1980, he said, three worlds existed — the first world consisting of democratic, capitalist countries, the second world consisting of communistic regimes and the third world consisting of underdeveloped, impoverished nations.

Initially, the second and third were at a battle with each other, but with the disappearance of the second world, Nagl said, the question left was how the first and third would interact with each other.

"The risk of human beings annihilating each other has gone away," Nagl said. "The primary question is how these people are going to deal with each other. It's a big change."

Nagl also discussed how forces of change toward the information age have affected acts of terror even as America enters an era of technology.

STATE IN BRIEF

By The Associated Press

Board of education group considers funding options

TOPEKA — The State Board of Education will consider whether it should continue fighting a school funding lawsuit while asking the Legislature for more education money.

The board will meet Tuesday with its lawyer to discuss the lawsuit, which alleges that the state's school funding system discriminates against minority and disabled students. The state pays small districts more money per pupil than large ones, which have more minority and disabled students.

The board also has asked lawmakers to increase education funding by $1.2 billion, or 50 percent, over the next three years.

Midsize school districts, like those in Derby, Augusta, El Dorado, Newton, Arkansas City and Winfield, filed the lawsuit in May 1999.

Since then, the districts have expanded the suit to question whether the state spends enough to provide a suitable education to all students, as required by the state Constitution.

The state board is just one of the defendants in the case. Others are the state, Gov. Bill Graves, Education Commissioner Andy Tompkins and the state board chairman.

The state payments to districts range from about $5,000 per student to more than $12,000.

Gubernatorial candidate to announce running mate

MARION — Attorney General Carla Stovall planned to kick off her gubernatorial campaign amid speculation that one of her rivals for the Republican nomination would drop out and run with her.

The attorney general also planned appearances in nine other cities Tuesday and Wednesday, starting in Wichita.

Stovall planned to announce her choice for lieutenant governor in Wichita, and many Republicans thought it would be House Speaker Kent Glasscock, who entered the governor's race in July.

Stovall, 44, first was elected attorney general in 1994 after serving as Crawford County's prosecutor and on the Kansas Parole Board. She was re-elected in 1998 with more than 75 percent of the vote, the highest of any statewide candidate.

If Glasscock joins Stovall's ticket, it would leave only her and State Treasurer Tim Shallenburger in the Aug. 6 primary, with Stovall representing moderates and Shallenburger, the conservative candidate.

Before Monday's rally, Stovall and her aides wouldn't discuss her choice of a running mate. Glasscock continued to say he still was running for governor.

Anthrax spores discovered in more senators' offices

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Trace amounts of anthrax have been discovered in the offices of Sens. Dick Lugar and Barbara Boxer, bringing to 10 the number of senators' offices found in recent days to be contaminated. All 10 are in the building where an anthrax-filled letter was opened Oct. 15.

Lugar, R-Ind., was told Sunday night a minute trace of anthrax was found in his office in the Hart Senate building, but it posed no health risk, Lugar's office said Monday.

David Sandretti, spokesman for Boxer, D-Calif., said Monday aides to the senator were told Sunday night that trace amounts of the bacteria were found on their office's mailroom table.

Over the weekend, officials said anthrax spores were found in the offices of eight other senators who work in that building.

U.S. puts military aircraft on airfields in Tajikistan

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Pentagon, hoping to intensify pressure on the Taliban, has decided to put military aircraft at one or more airfields in the former Soviet republic of Tajikistan on Afghanistan's northern border, a senior defense official said Monday.

The decision follows an on-site assessment by U.S. military advisers of the feasibility of using as many as three Tajik airfields. The Tajik government had offered the bases for U.S. use against Afghanistan, and the decision to go ahead could mean more Air Force fighter-bombers will be sent there soon.

One U.S. defense official, who discussed the matter on condition of anonymity, said it was not yet clear how much local improvement would be needed before the airfield could be put to use.

Sears Tower implementing X-ray security measures

CHICAGO — Employees and visitors at the Sears Tower will be screened with metal detectors and have their bags X-rayed as part of increased security at the nation's tallest building.

The X-ray baggage scanners debuted Monday in the tower's two main lobbies, where metal detectors will be operating in a week.

In a memo to the building's 125 tenants, officials from TrizecHahn Corp., the building's management company, said anyone failing to comply with the measures will not be allowed inside.

Long lines formed Monday morning as workers and visitors waited for their bags to be X-rayed.

Mark Spencer, a spokesman for TrizecHahn, said federal authorities have not warned of any specific or credible threat against the 110-story tower. Its observation deck reopened last month.

Two security consulting firms hired after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks recommended the measures, Spencer said.

Students operated bumper cars from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. in the K-State Student Union Courtyard Monday. The activity's purpose was to encourage students to relax between classes.

Union Courtyard becomes bumper car arena for event

BY DANA STRONGIN
Kansas State Collegian

Red and blue tubes created a four-sided arena of excitement Monday afternoon in the K-State Student Union.

The area had a carnival-like atmosphere as students smacked into one another in the name of bumper car fun.

Students scooted around a scuffed black floor in disc-like tubes with steering mechanisms on each side.

The bumper cars, which were free to all K-State students, were in operation from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. The purpose of the game was to give students a chance to let loose and have a little fun, said Shanna Burruss, graduate student and adviser for the Daytime Committee for the Union Program Council, which sponsored the event.

"We want students to have some stress relief," she said.

The event was one of two novelty events the committee has arranged for students this semester. The first event was wrestling in Sumo wrestling suits, Burruss said. The committee also sponsors the lunchtime music series in the Union Courtyard.

The money for the events comes from UPC through student fees and from the Union, Burruss said.

Fifty students had driven the cars by 12:30 p.m.

"People have been pretty excited," Burruss said. "I think they have grown up with bumper cars, and they are a happy memory."

Students used the tube cars to relax and have a good time.

"Sarah and I were looking for something fun to do and saw these and thought it looked like a fun thing to try and do," said Megan Menagh, junior in kinesiology of herself and her friend, Sarah Sourk, junior in political science and print journalism. "It did end up being fun, too," Menagh said.

More than 1 major could benefit students in work field

BY KECIA N. SEYB
Kansas State Collegian

Nearly one in 10 K-State students pursues two or more majors, which could be beneficial to them in the work field, professionals say.

A 1999 K-State alumna, Laura Henrichs, who now works as a corporate recruiter for PriceWaterhouseCoopers, LLP, in Salt Lake City, said having two majors — nutrition and kinesiology — benefited her greatly during the interview process.

"They mentioned in the interview that it wasn't necessarily what they were in, but that they had them," she said, "even though they're not related to my job."

Henrichs said that now, working in human resources, she looks at résumés of prospective employees. She said it was not easy to find a job in her major, so it was profitable to have two degrees.

"It's a very positive aspect to have on your résumé," she said. "I look at résumés all day. If they have two majors, that's a definite positive."

K-State offers 140 different undergraduate majors, and of the 22,396 students enrolled, 2,071 have two or more academic tracks.

Although Henrichs said having two or more majors definitely is worthwhile, Tracey Fraser, director of Career and Employment Services, said the advantages of a double major depend upon students' career interests.

That includes whether they want to go to graduate school and what their long-term goals are after finishing their undergraduate degree.

"I can't say it's better. I don't think you can say it's one over the other. It really has to be individualized per person," she said. "If you want to be a graphic artist, you need to have skills associated with that particular field. Mechanical engineering clearly is different."

"Everybody has the potential of taking skills and knowledge that can be applied in different arenas."

In addition to the typical majors, K-State offers seven secondary majors — women's studies, Latin American studies, natural resources and environmental sciences, international studies, industrial and labor relations, American ethnic studies and gerontology.

Secondary majors can be taken only in addition to the primary majors.

Secondary majors or minors provide individuals with a whole new skill set area and enhances a new marketability, Fraser said.

"For example, a modern language, looking at Spanish — Spanish is a very marketable language," she said. "That could complement someone's marketability whatever the case may be — education, the medical field."

"Those in public relations and business curriculum — it affords them to develop some technical skills in a variety of areas."

Henrichs said taking Spanish would have helped her out, working in Salt Lake City.

"I wish I would have taken Spanish. It would have been very helpful," she said.

Public service week positive for university

Because we live in a democracy, we have a voice. We elect our officials, and it is the job of the public and the media to watch the government and their actions.

Sometimes, the sheer size of local, state and national government can be daunting. It can be intimidating to try to make your voice heard.

This week is the first Government Awareness and Public Service week. All week there will be booths set up in the K-State Student Union that offer information about government and public services. One will show students how to contact local government officials. Other booths will showcase public services like Big Brothers/Big Sisters of Manhattan, Inc., and the American Red Cross.

We encourage students who are unaware of their local government officials to learn more about them this week and learn how to effectively voice their opinions.

We also commend the Student Governing Association for sponsoring this program. If you have time, stop by a booth this week and learn about government and how you can make a difference.

I was just wondering, what does it take for a girl to get a date in this godforsaken town?

For all of you fair weather fans, we played a great game on Saturday, and for Darren Sproles, you rock my world.

I don't want to hear anyone dissing on the Cats after our game in Nebraska. You guys played well, and I think we should all stand behind you. Go Cats.

To the people calling in disagreeing with Dan Smith's idiotic prediction last week — they were not being anti-K-State. They were being realistic. Let's face it. We are 4-5, 2-5 in the Big 12 and unranked. K-State does not have a good football team.

This is to the girl with the yellow helmet on the motorcycle: please marry me.

I was wondering on the way home, what was the last thing that went through a bug's mind as it hit my windshield? Then I figured it out — his butt.

We all go a little mad sometimes.

Take a moment today and think about those veterans who fought and died for our country. If you get a chance, go thank one.

To the person who made that comment about Matt Killingsworth on Friday: how much of a moron are you? Your comments made no sense. Oh yeah, you suck. Please don't call in any more with your stupid thoughts.

OK, in regards to the lady who is trying to find a guy. Let me ask this one question: Is there a girl out there who is not looking for a rich man and only a rich man?

It seems that in the realm of dating, I am surrounded by born millionaires and always being dumped for them.

The guy flexing on the back of the Collegian is the sexiest man alive.

I would just like to say dairy science is evil.

Did you see the veterans display in Umberger Hall? It really looked neat and thank you who ever did it. It was really an inspiration. Thanks.

Cheating 101

Academic shortcuts discredit education

I hate homework.

Worksheets, essays, projects and assignments all seem like busy work. Most students don't like wasting time on petty work like this, so it's tempting to copy off your buddy's old 'A' paper to get yours done.

Cheating is a proven easy way to guarantee your amount of homework will be cut down.

I mean, after you get kicked out of school, that should pretty much take care of your workload.

Cheating does nothing but negate the reason students take classes: to learn. It's so tempting to take that shortcut once in a while in classes that don't change.

This is where students catch themselves in bad situations.

In fall 1994, more than 100 students were busted for cheating on biology exams and were failed. Their trick was, one person took an early session of the exam, then passed on the questions to future test-takers.

The scheme worked for a while, but when it was broken up, the national reputation of K-State was tarnished. Television's ABC "20/20" program did a story on the rampant cheating, which provoked the university to research and establish our current Honor System.

No matter how hard the university might try to instill an understanding that cheating is bad, students hell-bent on not working still will find ways to skim by.

The ingenuity of students attempting to circumvent the system would impress the CIA. From notebooks on a student's lap to intricate formula programming and text notes in graphing calculators, teachers must always be on the lookout for charlatans.

Excuses I've heard used to justify cheating vary as much as the Kansas weather.

Some cheaters feel pud elective classes shouldn't require the same amount of work as core classes. So why not cut a few corners here and there?

Others are so overwhelmed by larger projects that a moment of indiscretion and plagiarism seems like the most effective use of time.

As logical as the excuses might be, they are just excuses.

Cheating is not just a shortcut for the person who commits the act. It also hurts the other

Jennifer Kimball/Collegian

For those who do the work, cheaters who blow test curves or copy old papers cheat them out of a fair grade.

It doesn't help

when teachers assign the exact same work semester after semester, leaving a trail of papers and projects available and applicable to future generations of Wildcats.

A bit of variety would go a long way in preventing recycling of expository writing essays and college algebra homework.

I realize the challenge all teachers have of designing an effective lesson plan at the collegiate level, but small switches would not be that demanding.

In classes that have been at K-State for decades like macroeconomics and biology, where the same work has been done by students since the Nixon administration, it's not surprising that cheating still happens.

Don't get me wrong. Teachers are not to blame for cheating. If students decide to cheat, the burden to bear rests squarely on their shoulders. It's just that teachers don't always make it much of a challenge to cheat.

Teachers have tried to stop cheating in the classroom with proctors who circle like vultures waiting for some poor sucker to whip out his crib sheet, and alternating test versions across rows only to have students reshuffle them.

It's sad teachers have to put forth effort to prevent ignorant students from robbing themselves of an education.

That's the irony of all of this cheating nonsense. Why pay money for classes, then try to cheat your way into getting a decent grade?

Academics seem to be the only thing students are willing to short change themselves on. We go psycho if someone forgets our fries in a drive-through. If we don't learn anything through an entire class and get an 'A,' that's considered a victory.

Maybe that's what people don't get about cheating. If someone's not willing to do the work, they shouldn't take the class. Find something else more interesting. Give others in the class a fair shot at a good grade.

With the end of the semester rapidly approaching, now's not the time to risk getting kicked out. The homework won't go away, but eventually we'll all graduate and get out of here.

Don't waste the semester by cutting a few corners. They might just come back and cut you.

Matt is a senior in advertising and public relations. You can e-mail him at smk8583@ksu.edu.

People should take time to know others, not trust stereotypes

People are like science fiction anthologies.

Wait, let me explain. My favorite sci-fi anthology is "The Year's Best Science Fiction, Eighth Annual Collection." My copy's dust jacket is tattered and stained.

The cover art isn't very impressive. In short, it doesn't look at all interesting or useful.

The inside of the book, however, tells a different story (believe it or not, I did not mean to make that pun).

Stories like James Patrick Kelly's "Mr. Boy," Nancy Kress' "Inertia" and Greg Egan's "Learning to Be Me" make this book one of the most enjoyable I've ever read. The expectations I had before actually reading the book were completely unjustified.

In the same way it's tempting to decide a book's value on the basis of its physical condition, it's also tempting to judge people's worth on the basis of how they look. All too often, we do exactly that.

This type of snap judgment can ruin a potentially great relationship.

Suppose you see a guy wearing a shirt with greek letters on it. If you're like me, you probably file him under the WASP elitist category.

There are several problems with this automatic profiling. For one thing, the guy might not fit into the category you assign him. More importantly, even if he does fit into that category, it doesn't tell you much about him as a person.

Micah Hawkinson

Although you might find out later your initial assessment of the guy with the greek T-shirt was a bad one, it already has colored the way you relate to him. It doesn't matter what he's really like; you haven't given him a chance to show you who he is beneath the surface.

In our society, we judge people by how they look. We tend to put everyone into carefully delineated boxes: goths, cowboys, nerds, losers, greeks — the list is longer than ... um, a really long thing.

We do this at K-State. In Aggieville, the guys hit on the prettiest girls. On campus, people who dress in radically different ways — say, a goth and a prep — generally don't take the time to introduce themselves to each other. At the K-State Student Union, people wearing Campus Crusade for Christ shirts tend to avoid those who wear shirts that say "Smile! There is no hell."

This can be harmful to our relationships. When we judge people before we see who and what they are, we make unfair assumptions and reach bad conclusions about them.

Maybe the jock who sits next to you in class likes to discuss Kant and Hume. That prep over in the corner might like acid punk music. Perhaps the computer geek wearing the Linux shirt cares about more than just his bandwidth size. You won't know unless you take the effort to find out.

Regardless of their personal beliefs and the way they look, people are all valuable. We all have hopes, dreams, interests and a need for human interaction. By judging the worth of others before meeting them, we deprive ourselves of the opportunity to expand our horizons and understand what the value of a person is.

It's stupid to judge a book by its cover. It's even more stupid to make assumptions about people you've never met just because of how they look.

The next time you meet someone new, take a look past the surface. Who knows? Beneath the facade of clothing, flesh and bone, you might find a kindred spirit.

Micah is a junior in English and history. You can e-mail him at mph7686@ksu.edu.

Columnist should rethink position on marriage laws

Editor,

This is a response to John V. Graham's column Nov. 7, in which he argued against cousin marriage laws.

I wish to congratulate him for his nice attempt.

But if he were a budding journalist, he should have spent much time on research, especially on a subject that is highly technical in nature and in which he is not well-informed himself, being a student in accounting and political science.

Consanguineous marriage (i.e. marriage between cousins) can result in an increased chance of having offspring with either abnormal (deformed or mentally disabled) or highly desirable characters. Being related, the partners naturally have common ancestors and might have received from them some genes that are alike.

Depending on the nature of genes that come together during mating, 'good' genes produce good phenotypes, while 'bad' genes produce undesirable traits. Generally, this type of marriage increases the homozygosity in the population.

The coefficient of inbreeding, a tool which measures consanguinity, for first cousin mating is high.

I don't know if cousin marriage laws in Kansas were enacted just to make people looked civilized, but one thing I am sure of is that genetics must have something to do with it.

Ironically, he cited the case of a couple in Kansas wherein one has been diagnosed to have a life-threatening disease. If the disease is genetic, chances are the other partner has the 'bad' gene, too, because this gene should have come from their common ancestor. Think of the children the couple will have if ever they get married.

John, your high school biology teacher taught you the fact, not a myth.

DOMINATING their foes

Mahoney, Wecker lead offense in final regular season tune up

BY BEN FEHR

Kansas State Collegian

K-State women's basketball was host to an unusual foe Sunday at Bramlage Coliseum as the Cats bested Spartak Moscow in dominating fashion, 94-56.

The Russian squad came into Manhattan for the eighth game of its nine-game, five-state American tour winless.

It was the Cats who came out flat, though, trading baskets with Spartak before pulling ahead to stay with a Laurie Koehn three-pointer at the 9:50 mark of the first half, struggling at times to penetrate Spartak's zone defense.

Head coach Deb Patterson said she worked only sparingly with her team on offense versus the zone and was pleased to have the new look come up against Spartak.

"I believe seeing the zone was important," Patterson said. "It takes away passing lanes and really challenges the looks your guards get."

"I thought it was a good experience for our ball club."

K-State eventually adjusted to the zone and five Cats finished with double-figure scoring, paced by 19 points from freshman Megan Mahoney and a team best 20 from freshman Kendra Wecker.

Mahoney said intensity and Spartak's grueling schedule were factors in the outcome of the contest.

"We had a lot of adrenaline," Mahoney said. "We had a lot of energy, and she told us at halftime that we needed to pick it up on defense."

"A lot of our steals came in the second half. We started to push the ball up and they were getting a little tired. So, we were able to get some easy baskets."

Mahoney and Wecker were supported by an impressive team performance against Spartak.

Redshirt freshman Laurie Koehn banged home three of six from beyond the arc, finishing with 14. Senior Kristin Rethman added 11 and sophomore standout Nicole Ohlde posted a double-double, firing 12 points from the field and pulling down 10 rebounds.

Ohlde said Spartak and the exhibition season have helped to give the team an idea of their capabilities.

"In exhibition, we wanted to come in and get a feel for things," Ohlde said. "We still have a lot of things to improve on, but we got a feel for our zone offense and we got to see what we will have to do in games."

Patterson said she was pleased with both the experience and the outcome of the exhibition season.

"The two teams we played put us in a position to see different styles of play," Patterson said. "For the Moscow team to come in and play a zone was very good for this basketball team."

"It is rare in a two-game series to see exactly what you would have hoped to have seen, and we did."

After besting Moscow, and finishing the exhibition season 2-0, the Wildcats now will look to their season opener with Georgia Tech at Alexander Memorial Coliseum in Atlanta on Friday.

Patterson said she believes there are a number of positives the Wildcats can build on in preparation for Georgia Tech, a team receiving national top 25 consideration.

"One thing that comes to mind immediately is that we have a team with an aggressive mind set," Patterson said.

"We are getting up and down the floor at a better tempo than we have in the past."

Patterson said the Cats' intensity has grown since the team's first exhibition game, and she expects that trait to be an important part of K-State's gameplan this season.

"I like the energy they are bringing and I like their 'No fear' mentality," Patterson said. "I expect to see that same demeanor and that same dimension in the future."

"These players are competitors and they value and respect the opportunity — when that ball goes up, to get after it. It is something, I truly think, that we will build upon and never, never lose."

Freshman class excels in preseason play

BY DAN SMITH

Kansas State Collegian

So much for the learning curve.

In only her second game at the college level, freshman Kendra Wecker has become a full-fledged playmaker on a K-State squad that might be short on experience, but certainly rich in talent.

"I think when they recruited us and brought us all in, they knew what they were looking for — get some more athleticism in the gym," Wecker said after leading the Cats with 20 points in K-State's 94-56 win over Spartak Moscow on Sunday at Bramlage Coliseum.

The first-year forward from Marysville, Kan., also grabbed four rebounds and a team-high five assists, and fellow freshman Megan Mahoney turned in a 19-point, seven-rebound performance as K-State wrapped up the preseason stretch with its fifth straight exhibition win.

For the second straight game, four freshmen were in the Wildcat starting lineup. Along with Wecker and Mahoney, redshirt freshman Laurie Koehn and first-year point guard Kari Hanson joined last year's Big 12 Freshman of the Year Nicole Ohlde.

And for the second straight game, the freshmen came up big, accounting for nearly two-thirds of the Wildcats' scoring.

"It's amazing," Ohlde said of the incoming freshman class. "Sometimes I just want to sit back and watch these girls play because man, can they play."

The group's early success is a direct result of an off-the-court preparation process that Wecker said the team has taken very seriously this preseason.

"We each have our own individual roles and parts that we play on this team, and each one of us goes out there and works at what we're supposed to do. And that just makes the whole team better," Wecker said.

In fact, the group has jelled so well together that head coach Deb Patterson said all four freshmen should start the Cats' season opener Friday night at Georgia Tech.

"I like this group right now," she said. "I think you could expect, barring any problems with our health or welfare, that this will be the group we bring to Georgia Tech and start with and I feel very good about that at this point."

Patterson's optimism is not without merit as statistics prove this year's freshman class to be one of the coach's best in.

Wecker will begin the season averaging 13 points and 3.5 rebounds per game after the exhibition

Ethridge being inducted into hoops hall of fame

K-State assistant women's basketball coach Kamie Ethridge will be inducted into the Women's Basketball Hall of Fame on April 26-27 in Knoxville, Tenn., K-State Sports Information announced Sunday.

While Ethridge's contributions have helped develop K-State into a dangerous three-point shooting team since her arrival in 1996, her biggest achievements came in her playing days as a point guard at the University of Texas from 1983 to 1987.

During her career with the Longhorns, Ethridge led the team to an NCAA championship in 1986 and the first undefeated season in NCAA history (34-0).

Since the completion of her career, Ethridge has coached at Northern Illinois and Vanderbilt before coming to K-State.

"I am humbled and honored to be named an inductee into the Women's Basketball Hall of Fame," Ethridge said Sunday. "Just the thought of it takes my breath away. I feel blessed for having been given the opportunity to play this game."

Air travel considerations change Women's tipoffs

Air travel has effected the K-State women's basketball team's Paradise Jam tournament on Nov. 24-26 at St. Thomas in the U.S. Virgin Islands, K-State Sports Information said Monday.

The Wildcats' first game Saturday, Nov. 24 with the University of Richmond has been moved from 8 p.m. to 6:45 p.m.

Instead of playing Arizona State on Monday at 9 a.m. and Western Michigan on Sunday at 12:30 p.m., the Cats now will play Arizona State on Sunday at 2:15 p.m. and Western Michigan at 10:15 a.m. Monday.

McGwire's career leaves legacy for baseball fans

The baseball postseason has been over for a week now, the World Series trophy has been relocated from the East Coast to the West Coast, but the sport still is in the spotlight.

On Sunday, one of the greatest men ever to play the sport, Mark McGwire, announced he is turning in his cleats.

The Big Mac is calling it quits.

For years, I have watched this record-breaking first baseman, and for years I stood in awe.

With 583 total career home runs, the fifth most in history, a career slugging percentage of .588 and nearly 6,200 at-bats during his 16 seasons, McGwire always has been a favorite of mine.

Back in the early days when I was in grade school, growing up in Alameda, Calif., Mac was in nearby Oakland as one of the Bash Brothers with fellow Athletic Jose Canseco. I collected as many McGwire baseball cards as I could get my grubby hands on.

Eating up anything I could hear or see about McGwire, I only could dream about meeting the Mac. I used to get into trouble in second grade for bringing my baseball cards to class all the time.

Ah, to be young again, when athletes still were gods to me — when athletes were respectable.

I would push my sisters away from the television, anxiously awaiting for Mac to take the plate at Oakland Coliseum as the girls would run off crying to my mom.

I didn't care if the "Care Bears" movie was on or not. The A's were my team.

It didn't take McGwire very long to make it to the World Series, just three seasons before he met up with Tony Lasorda and the Los Angeles Dodgers.

Unfortunately, the A's lost the series 4-1, but I still have my ticket stub from the fifth and final game.

That was the last game I ever went to at the Coliseum because I moved to Colorado six months later, but I never will forget those nine innings.

My abandonment of the Bay area didn't damage McGwire's resolve the following season, rather, it strengthened it (I know, he had to play harder and better to deal with the emotional loss of his greatest fan).

Even though I wasn't there to watch the battle between the A's cross-town rivals, the San Francisco Giants, that series never will be forgotten, either.

My boy Mac didn't play very well, he didn't get the MVP award, he didn't even score a single run for that matter, but he made his presence felt in Frisco.

It is debatable whether it's his fault (or mine, for leaving), but that magnificent 7.1 earthquake in San Francisco just prior

Youthful Wildcat equestrian team finishes strong at Texas A&M show

BY BEN FEHR

Kansas State Collegian

Last weekend, the western half of K-State's equestrian team came in third place overall at shows hosted by Texas A&M in College Station, Texas.

On Saturday, three Wildcats paced the team with first-place finishes in their respective classes.

Sophomore Brandi Vogel finished first in advanced II horsemanship, sophomore Megan Hemberger was tops in intermediate I horsemanship, and junior Heather Hicks captured the top spot in beginner horsemanship.

Hicks said she was excited about her personal accomplishment but believes K-State is capable of making a better showing as a team.

"I feel pretty good about my finish this weekend," Hicks said. "I have really been working hard and my first-place finish put me up into intermediate I, and it will put me into regionals."

"We have a lot of new girls. We have some young girls who are very good and we have them in each division."

Hicks said improvement should come with more experience.

"We have good years ahead of us and we expect a lot of ourselves. I think we just need to go out and have fun because once everybody relaxes, we will just be awesome."

On Sunday, the team again placed third, but this time, the only first place individual showing came from senior Kelly Gratny. Gratny said the drawing of horses at College Station led to some problems early in the show.

"It is very much luck of the draw and it makes a huge difference," Gratny said. "Our drawing skills just were not with us

LOCAL TALENT

WHO: Jeremy Julian, GoldenEye tournament champion

Jeremy Julian, freshman in computer and electrical engineering, won the Licensed to Kill 2001: "GoldenEye" Tournament on Saturday.

Though Julian has rarely played the game in the last year and a half, he said he still plays computer games such as "Haffire: Counterstrike," as well as occasionally playing the Nintendo 64 James Bond video game. Julian said he felt lucky to come out on top of the 120 participants in the competition.

"I didn't think I would win. I just went there for the free T-shirt," he said.

Julian said he won a variety of T-shirts, as well as a set of two-way car speakers.

Each round, he played three other people in a four-way game of "GoldenEye" in 10-minute rounds. When given a choice, Julian said he chose to play the "Licensed to Kill" setting with pistols, meaning it takes only one hit to make a kill in the game.

Participants promoted a friendly atmosphere without getting too competitive, Julian said. The idea of winning didn't even occur until the end was near, he said.

"It didn't even hit me that I could win until there were only eight people left and I was like, 'Whoa, it looks like I'm going to get eighth place.'"

"LOST" in theater

Student-produced play combines several different one-acts into single production

Story by Sarah Rice ■ Photos by Karen Mikols

An unusual experience in theater is taking place in the Purple Masque Theatre this weekend.

Three one-act plays will be presented in one production, titled "Lost."

The project is 100 percent student-driven, with student playwrights, directors, crew, stage designers and actors.

The three scripts being produced were written in an advanced playwriting class last spring, then were selected by faculty members. The cast has been rehearsing for a month and a half.

Mike Eaton, senior in theater, is directing "Two Peas," written by Amanda Moon, senior in theater.

"It is a bad situation," he said. "It is the internal struggle in life. I don't want to say much and give it away."

Eaton said directing a student-written play has provided challenges.

"I am hoping that I do her script justice," he said.

Moon has decided not to watch her play onstage until opening night.

"It is a scary thing to see something you've written being produced," she said.

In the next one-act, Moon and Eaton switch roles. Moon directs "Hidden Person," which is written by Eaton. The play revolves around a man dealing with a history of problems.

"He just got out of prison, but things are in his way that he has to work through," said Joni Redmond, sophomore in theater and actor in "Hidden Person."

Eaton said writing a one-act play has to be done carefully, and the process is different from a full-length play.

"With a one-act, you have to tell the story in a small amount of time," he said. "You have to keep the audience's attention and tell the story right."

Moon also said she feels pressure directing a play with the playwright present.

"Since Mike is a really good friend, it is a challenge," she said. "I really want it to be a good show. That is always true, but particularly here."

Moon and Eaton said they consulted each other early on in the process for specific interpretations.

"We decided we wanted to see what each other could bring to the scripts," Moon said.

Eaton said seeing his writing acted out on stage is a dream come true.

"It's really exciting having it produced by these people," he said. "It's like a dream. It's with people I know and respect."

Eaton, like Moon, is waiting until opening night to watch his writing in production.

"I wanted to be surprised by the finished product rather than watch it grow," he said.

The third play, "Coming Clean," is directed by Garrett Gottschalk, senior in theater, and written by Liz Skrabacz, graduate student in English.

The piece is about a woman named Anna, whose daughter ran away from home five years before the present time period in the play, Gottschalk said.

"It is a journey through her mind to a metaphorical escape," he said. "It is about her coming to grips with her situation through the help of other characters that she envisions. She learns to help herself."

Redmond said she enjoys working for a student director, compared to a faculty director.

"We can be goofier," she said. "It is amazing how much still gets done. It happens and it happens well."

Tyler Lansdown, senior in theater and actor in "Hidden Person," said although his director has the same amount of experience as the actors, it has not created difficulties.

"We have a lot of fun," he said. "We get to mess around, but she tells us what she wants."

After the performances, the casts will have the opportunity to be judged at the American College Theater Festival on Jan. 22-27 in Lincoln, Neb.

At the festival, the plays are adjudicated according to certain categories and the best are sent to an international competition over the summer.

Gottschalk said he encourages students to attend the shows and see the talent of their peers.

"Students should support students no matter what they do," he said. "The theater department here at KSU has a lot to offer. We have wonderful actors, technicians and playwrights."

Eaton said he thinks students should come for fun.

"They will have fun with them because they are really good scripts," he said.

Becky Dillon, playing Vicky, explains the office routine to her new boss during "Coming Clean." The play centers around a woman who is trying to deal with losing her child.

Second language helps students outside of classroom, in job hunt

BY LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

Learning a second language can give students many benefits outside the classroom.

"It gives them an edge in an increasingly multicultural and multilingual environment and in a growing global community," Jean-Louis Hippolyte, assistant professor of French, said.

K-State offers students an array of choices for choosing a foreign language to learn. Students can learn Arabic, French, German, Greek, Italian, Japanese, Latin, Russian and Spanish.

Emily Koehler, sophomore in secondary education, said she would like to be a Spanish teacher someday.

She said she thinks knowing a second language has become increasingly more important in this country.

"We are living in a more and more bilingual world, with more Spanish-speaking people, especially," she said.

Koehler said she does not think one language is better than another, but that Spanish is more dominant as a second language in America.

"I think this is because a lot more people are immigrating over here from Mexico, so knowing Spanish over other languages can be more useful," she said.

Hippolyte said Spanish is the most popular foreign language for students. He said he feels even taking one language class could help students.

"What about just learning to turn right when you take driving lessons, but not turn left? Why not run with only one shoe?" he said. "You might still be able to go forward, but you will be that much less able to interact successfully with the world around you."

Koehler and Cassie Luke, sophomore in open-option, said knowing a second language also makes you more appealing to employers and helps in obtaining jobs.

"Even if you do not use your second language on a day-to-day basis, you have established that you are open-minded to other cultures," Luke said.

Douglas Benson, associate professor of Spanish, said there are hundreds of companies in Kansas that do business with other countries and language skills are a specific requirement.

"A student who actually makes progress and can communicate in the language is a valuable asset to many companies," he said.

Luke began taking Spanish because she said the idea of speaking in a foreign language sounded exciting.

"It gave me a glimpse of a culture outside my world," she said.

Benson said he thinks students should go all the way with a language, whether that be through a minor, major or as part of a dual major, and that students need to take more than a few language courses.

"Any language study is a help in getting people beyond their one language, one culture 'blindness' to see a larger world, but a few classes will usually not get you far enough to use a language in any real world situation beyond tourism or survival situations," he said.

Benson said all types of majors take language courses, from journalists to architects.

"And they tend to live more richer lives: music, fashion, food, conversations, and the understanding of local, national and world events," he said.

Hippolyte said languages can be teaching tools in many ways.

"It is first and foremost a way to learn about yourself, about your own sense of normality, and about how we all have different senses of what is normal and not. They shape world views that are often distinct from one another, and it teaches you a better understanding of others," he said.

"After all, we only have one planet, we all have to share it, right?"

MAJORS

women's studies, said that to qualify for a secondary major, students must complete 24 hours.

She said it varies from discipline to discipline whether a second major truly is valuable. For example, in women's studies, students can develop some expertise in women's issues that can be useful in several areas such as family services, social work and sociology.

"It's valuable increasingly in the business world in marketing products to women and what issues are offensive," she said. "The most valuable part is things you've just grown up taking for granted that that's the way it is, you see very differently."

She said the 40-50 secondary majors and 60 minors in women's studies each year benefit especially in the helping professions.

Jeremy May, senior in anthropology and philosophy, said he wants to add women's studies and rhetoric communications to his list of majors.

"I like a diverse background," he said. "I don't like to pigeon-hole myself in one area."

May, who plans to stay for a fifth year, said he probably won't find a job with his anthropology and philosophy majors.

"But, you can sell yourself with that communication," he said.

"With anthropology, you can sell yourself saying you understand other cultures to help your business."

He said he plans to attend graduate school or law school, and he thinks his array of majors will look impressive on those applications.

He said he also is considering going into culinary school following his undergraduate studies.

And, that doesn't tie into anything I'm taking right now. I have lots of interests," he said. "It's not that hard to get a dual major. People think it is. The majors I'm in aren't so bad."

"Some majors — you know how they give you a new perspective — I think it's good to have different perspectives. I'll have two perspectives instead of just one."

EQUESTRIAN

this weekend."

To be successful in equine competition, it is essential to be paired with a good horse. It is pretty simple. If you get a bad horse, it doesn't matter how talented a rider you are — you probably are going to struggle to have a good ride, she said.

"In competition, you will either have balanced classes of horses or you will have just good horses and bad horses," she said. "Unfortunately, this weekend, we were pretty good at picking the bad ones."

After a first place overall showing at K-State's home meet Sept. 14, the Cats jumped out to an early lead in point standings for the region.

Gratny said the team's expectations were high going into competition Saturday.

"We are a little bit frustrated after this weekend because we all felt like we had performed so well," Gratny said. "We did not do as well as we had hoped, and unfortunately, we lost the lead we had in the region point standings."

Surrendering the top rank in the region, while disappointing for the Cats, does not mean K-State's chance for finishing first has completely slipped away, though.

Gratny said the team will continue to work hard to show the qualities that make K-State a strong and talented group of riders. Western competition resumes Feb. 2, in Stillwater, Okla., at Oklahoma State University.

"We are still very much in a position to come back and lead the region," Gratny said. "We rode so well this weekend and just did not get the recognition we deserved."

"The world is changing faster than any time in history," Nagl said. "Personally, I think you and I are in the Kitty Hawk phase of the revolution. In 30 to 40 years, it will have changed everything."

Rapid population growth, along with urbanization in third tier countries, is a major factor, he said.

"Those are breeding grounds not just for disease, but for people that will fly planes," he said.

Nagl said another source of hostility is globalization and the effects it can have on a country.

Nagl pointed out that even before Sept. 11 the flag could be found everywhere.

He said this is the way America finds a common identity because the American people are so diverse.

In places like Japan, he said, there is more of a homogenous society of culture, race, religion and food that helps the country to confirm their national identity.

Globalization, he said, makes these countries feel their national identity is being torn away, creating bitterness and hostility.

Nagl said that by 2025 he believes the third tier will show and increase with the second splitting in two. He said that while he feels this will be a positive change those left behind are the big threat to the system.

Nagl said asymmetric threats are rapidly increasing since it is the most effective way to threaten a super power like the United States.

Some examples he mentioned were nuclear, biological and chemical warfare, missile technology, special operating forces, cyber warfare and terror.

"This war has become a survival level interest to us," Nagl said.

CRASH

Mayor Rudolph Giuliani said.

American Airlines said there were 251 passengers — including five infants sitting on their parents' laps — and nine crew members.

"I don't believe there are any survivors at this point," Giuliani said. By evening, 258 bodies had been recovered, authorities said.

At least six and perhaps as many as eight people, all adults, were reported missing on the ground, the mayor said.

Six houses were destroyed, and six others sustained serious damage — in some cases, the siding was melted off the homes by intense heat.

Roberto Valentin, a Dominican ambassador at large, spoke through tears when he said he believed 90 percent of the passengers were Dominican. New York City has 455,000 Dominicans.

Relatives of passengers crowded Santo Domingo's airport, sobbing and grasping each other after hearing about the crash.

"Oh my God!" said Miriam Fajardo, crying after being told that her sister and three nephews were aboard. "I hadn't seen them in eight years. Now they're gone."

The rectory of St. Francis de Sales, one block from the crash site, was used as an emergency command center. Its pastor, Monsignor Martin Geraghty, was called away to bless bodies.

Firefighter Joe O'Brien accompanied the priest. The monsignor blessed about 20 bodies, which were being laid out on the street right in front of the crash site, O'Brien said.

"Right now they're just recovering bodies. The FBI is looking for evidence," he said. "And the priests are down there consoling firemen."

ELKINTON

to Game 3 at Candlestick Park broke the Giants' will and the A's swept the series 11 days later.

It was beautiful.

No, the burning buildings and the collapsed freeway from the quake weren't beautiful, but you know what I mean.

My boy has had his share of loss, as well, when his team ironically was swept in the following year's Series by the Cincinnati Reds. You can't win 'em all.

That was, unfortunately, the last time Mac would play in the Fall Classic, but he had a good run while it lasted.

Despite falling short of the pennant for the next 11 years, history always will remember the 1998 season when McGwire surpassed Roger Maris' home run record, leaving destruction in his wake as he finally rested at the then-unimaginable number of 70.

After a 16-year career with the A's and Cardinals, he will be missed.

At 38 years old, Mark McGwire, the first baseman from Pomona, Calif., will go down in the books as one of the most phenomenal players ever to run the diamond. He has assured his spot in the Hall of Fame as well as the hearts of millions of fans nationwide, including this columnist.

See ya, Mac.

NEW YORK — The cockpit voice recorder from American Flight 587 indicates the pilots struggled to control the plane after a rattling was heard less than two minutes into takeoff, investigators reported Tuesday.

George Black Jr. of the National Transportation Safety Board said investigators do not yet know what caused the airframe rattling noise.

Also, the pilots spoke of encountering turbulence in the wake of a Japan Airlines jumbo jet that took off ahead of Flight 587, Black said. Wake turbulence is believed to have contributed to other deadly airline crashes.

But Black said it was too early to say if there was any relationship between the noises or the turbulence and the crash of Flight 587.

From takeoff to the end of the tape lasts less than two minutes, 24 seconds, Black said at a news conference.

The first portion of the flight to the Dominican Republic appeared normal, with the co-pilot at the controls. But 107 seconds after the plane had started its takeoff roll, a rattling was heard. Fourteen seconds later, a second rattle was audible, Black said.

Twenty-three seconds later — after several comments suggesting loss of control — the cockpit voice recording ends, he said.

The plane's other black box, the flight data recorder, was recovered Tuesday after a 24-hour hunt through a Queens neighborhood staggered by a double dose of tragedy. At least 262 people were killed when the plane crashed.

The NTSB also was looking at whether the engines failed after sucking in birds, a phenomenon that has caused severe damage to airliners in the past. But Black said an initial inspection of the engines found no evidence of such a collision. He said a more detailed analysis still needs to be done.

All 260 people aboard the twin-engine Airbus A300 were killed, and five others were reported missing on the ground after the fiery crash Monday in the beachfront Rockaway section of Queens.

Mayor Rudolph Giuliani said 262 bodies had been recovered, along with dozens of body parts. Authorities were working with family members to identify remains through DNA.

The flight data recorder — one of two black boxes aboard the jetliner — tracks speed and the performance of the engine and instruments.

Authorities have not ruled out sabotage or other potential causes, but said the evidence so far suggests it was an accident — perhaps a catastrophic mechanical failure in the engines.

The General Electric engines on the Airbus A300 model have drawn close scrutiny since the spring of 2000, when planes reported engine failures that sent metal fragments flying.

However, NTSB chairman Marion Blakey said Tuesday that the engines were largely intact.

Stovall announces Glasscock as election running mate

BY PAUL RESTIVO
Kansas State Collegian

Attorney General Carla Stovall announced House Speaker Kent Glasscock as her running mate in her first statewide campaign for the Republican gubernatorial nomination Tuesday evening in Manhattan.

"I believe you are looking at the next governor and lieutenant governor," Stovall said.

Stovall and Glasscock spoke to a crowd of about 100 at City Hall and expressed the importance of the 2002 election.

"This is an election that is critically important," Glasscock said. "This is the time of all times after Sept. 11 that Kansans and Americans need a new destiny."

Stovall stressed that community and working together is key in having a successful ticket in the governor's race.

Stovall and Glasscock expressed the need for Kansans to be concerned about the future of the state and to help support their ticket in achieving their goals.

Kansans have the choice either to move forward or to sit back and not get involved, Glasscock said.

Glasscock, who started his own campaign for governor in July, joined Stovall after the race became a contest between Stovall and State Treasurer Tim Shallenburger. Glasscock raised $200,000 in his campaign, but Kansas law allows him to transfer it to Stovall.

"I couldn't be more proud to be part of this ticket," Glasscock said. "We will campaign hard, and we will win in August. And we will win in November."

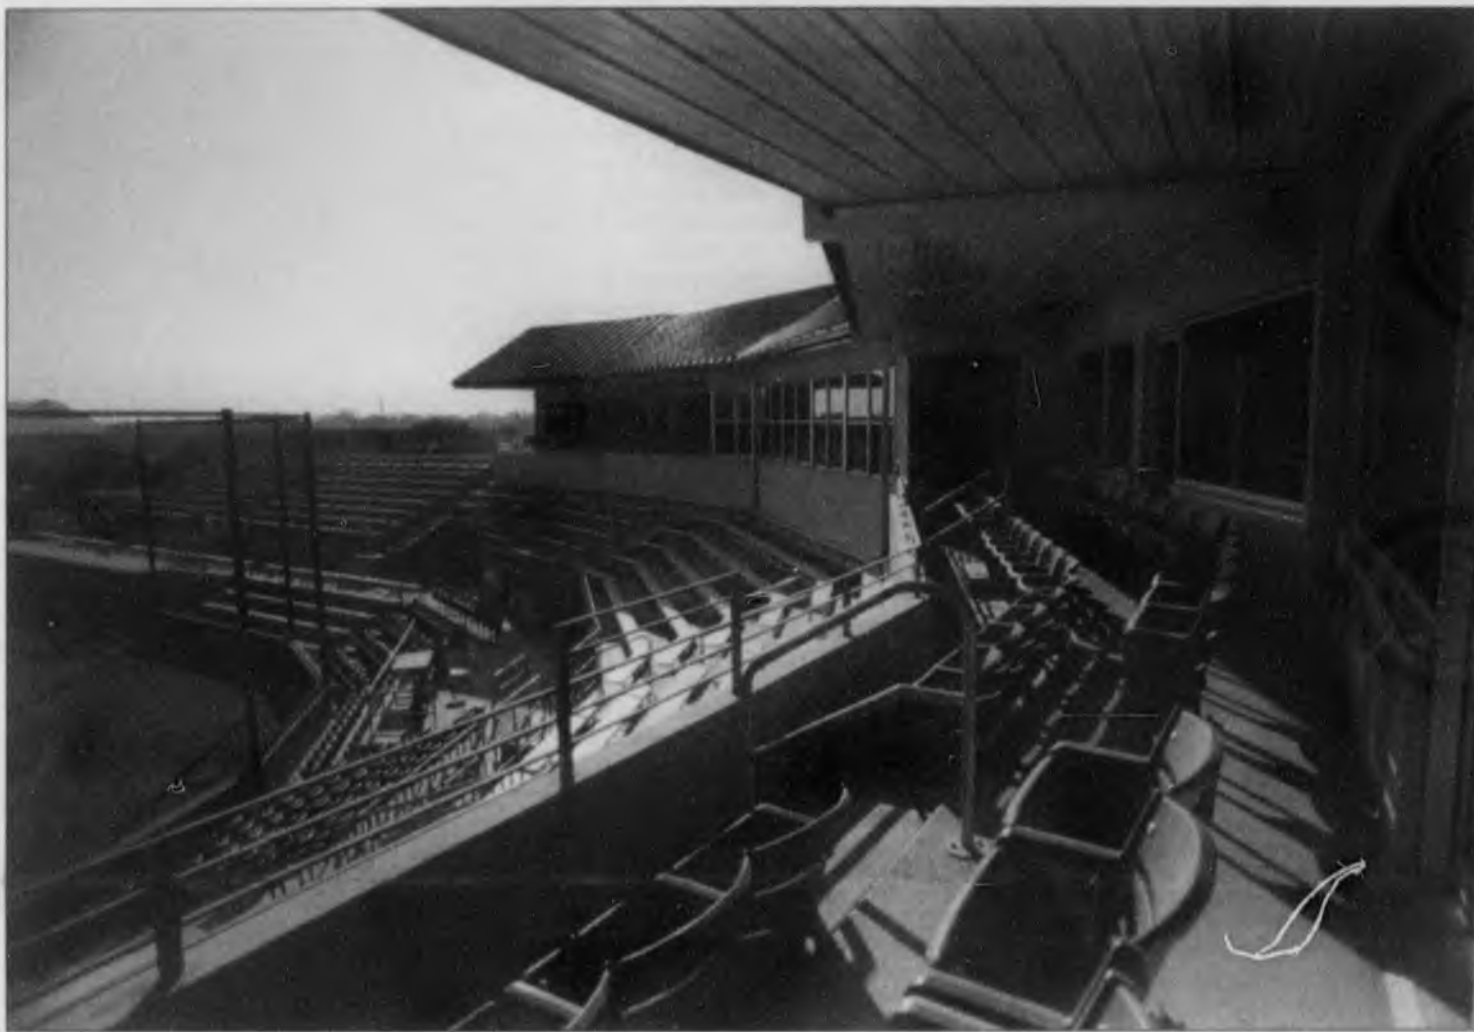

The announcement of Glasscock as Stovall's running mate comes at an unusual time. Typically, candidates wait until the spring when the June 10 candidate filing deadline approaches.

Stovall, 44, served as Crawford County's prosecutor and on the Kansas Parole Board before she was elected attorney general in 1994.

Glasscock served two years as mayor of Manhattan, his hometown, before he was elected to the House in 1990. He has been House Speaker since January.

In addition to Shallenburger, two other potential Republican candidates remain. Senate President Dave Kerr, Hutchinson, will decide after the 2002 Legislature concludes, and former state GOP Chairman David Miller — who challenged Graves in the 1998 election — also is looking at joining the race.

A Weiser vision

Athletics director focuses on student-athlete welfare

BY DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

It might be only the fifth month of Tim Weiser's tenure as K-State's athletics director, but his vision for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics is anything but impaired.

Coming to Manhattan after a three-year stint at Colorado State University, Weiser said he knew he'd have his share of obstacles, as would anyone taking on a new job in a new environment.

But he's used his 13 years of AD experience as a guide, and as that transition phase begins to deteriorate, his responsibilities become that much more clear.

He has that vision.

Especially in the long-term, Weiser has one unchanging precedent he intends to cultivate and preserve as the center of his target — the student-athlete welfare issue.

"I think at the end of the day, yes, winning and losing is a very important part of things," Weiser said, "and yes, the finances are critical to the operation of our program, but if we have all those things in place, but yet, we're not providing a quality experience for our student-athletes, then I think we've missed the mark."

Two aspects to gauge that experience, Weiser said, are a degree and a championship — entities that should always go hand-in-hand.

In accomplishing this objective, though, Weiser said, K-State must develop a solid communication network system with its student-athletes, one that allows the athletics department to identify its strengths and weaknesses, particularly the areas it appears to fall short.

STUDENT-ATHLETE WELFARE

Currently, the NCAA requires student-athletes to complete exit interviews with their respective universities upon completing eligibility. Weiser said that's a good step, but unfortunately, it doesn't give the college a chance to correct issues they might not point out until after the fact.

"We want to see if we can't find those things out along the way," he said, "so that by the time they reach that exit interview, they're going to say, 'Well, here was a problem I had, but that changed and it felt real good, and boy, I just had the best time here at K-State.'"

In turn, Weiser is having a Student-Athlete Forum at 6:30 p.m. Thursday in the Bramlage Coliseum Legends Room.

The forum will give student-athletes a chance to voice their opinions and concerns about their K-State experiences, both positive and negative — things that might come from losing, struggles academically or a host of other issues.

"If we don't give our student-athletes — our customers, if you will — the chance to tell us, we'll never know," he said.

For those wishing to remain anonymous, Weiser said suggestion or comment boxes have been strategically placed around the athletic facilities, allowing student-athletes to communicate in that manner.

Weiser believes utilizing these kinds of opportunities, as well as taking advantage of Massages reduce muscle tension, help relieve semester-end stress

BY MICHAEL WATSON
Kansas State Collegian

For many students who are stressed from class, work or recreation, getting a massage is the answer to their problems.

Doug Sellers, massage therapist and owner of Body First, said stress is one of the biggest causes for health problems. Massage is a preventive maintenance against stress.

"We have a bunch of students that come in during finals," he said. "After they cram, they come in for a massage to relax."

One study conducted at the University of Miami Touch Institute shows that massage therapy gives the client clear thought and increases test scores.

"When you are stressed, you don't think clearly," he said.

Stress itself will cause muscle damage. Toxins and lactic acids increase and muscles tighten. Stress also causes high blood pressure and different forms of anxiety.

With a K-State student identification, a one-hour massage costs $25 at Body First.

There are different techniques to relieve tension, but Sellers said relaxing starts with the environment. When you walk into the room you hear soft, soothing music, the trickle of a water fountain and the lights are dim. He said being comfortable is the first step to relaxation.

Sellers said the type of technique used varies from person to person. The Swedish massage is the stress-relieving massage, the most common technique used. It is a general flowing technique designed to move blood and lymph and to relieve aching muscles.

Another technique is trigger point therapy.

"In every muscle there is at least one trigger point," Sellers said. "From one point, it spreads to the rest of the body. When you have a muscle, the tension will center at that point. By applying pressure to that point, it will allow the pain cycle, going back and forth, to break, allowing the muscle to relax. Then, you use the Swedish technique for relaxation."

There are six therapists at Body First. Sellers said it is important to find a therapist they are comfortable with.

"Massage is a personable business. If a client is not comfortable, they are not going to relax," he said. "That's why it is important to find a therapist that will work for them — using the right styles."

The basic massage is an unscented hypoallergenic lotion, he said. If somebody wants a scented massage, they mix a scent into the lotion.

"In addition to massage therapy, clients can go to Body First for spa treatment. We have people that come in for day packages. They will completely relax you," Sellers said.

Mary Beth Reese said she has been getting a massage once a week for the past year.

"I used to have to go to the chiropractor once a month," she said. "But, not with massage therapy."

When Reese was diagnosed with breast cancer, she said massage therapy helped relieve the pain.

"It relieved the toxins of the Local charities seek holiday volunteers

BY SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

More than 2,500 families — a record number — have signed up to receive free Thanksgiving dinners from the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Now, the local agency is scrambling to find volunteers to accommodate those in need.

MORE INFO?

Here's how to find out about volunteer opportunities: Call the Breadbasket at 537-0730 or e-mail at breadbasket@interkan.net. Call the Salvation Army at 539-9399. Call the American Red Cross at 537-2180.

really taken aback."

The Breadbasket is looking for volunteers to assemble the Thanksgiving and Christmas food baskets, clean up after the community Thanksgiving dinner, buy or wrap Christmas gifts and deliver holiday meals. The organization also is accepting cash donations, turkeys and chickens.

The Breadbasket isn't alone. Many local organizations are trying to fill volunteer positions as the holiday season approaches.

Bramhall said the annual dinner usually receives about 1,000 guests. This year, it could be more.

"I'm trying to figure out why this is," she said. "That way, we can project how it's going to be during Christmas."

Even after 11 years in the business, Bramhall still is unable to predict the attendance for each event.

"I have no idea," she said. Adding to the crunch is a lack of funds, Bramhall said. The Breadbasket probably will have to make some cuts, but hopefully they won't be too noticeable, she said.

Bramhall attributes the funding problem to Sept. 11. People immediately donated what they could to the New York relief efforts, which prevented people from donating to other charities.

"We understand," she said. "It's just a tough go."

Another local agency looking for help is the Salvation Army.

Its annual bell-ringing project, which raised $44,000 last year, kicks off Friday. Capt. Johnny Harsh, director of the Salvation Army, said the organization still is looking for bell ringers.

People interested in singing or playing a musical instrument next to the bell ringers also are welcome, Harsh said. Entertainment usually doubles the donations.

Harsh said he encourages individuals, families, clubs, organizations, sororities and fraternities to get involved. Bell ringers are set up at Wal-Mart, Kmart and the two Dillons stores.

"You might be able to help your neighbor. You might be able to help the person down the street or someone you work with," he said. "When people get into trouble, they sometimes get embarrassed and don't say anything. You'd be surprised at who you're helping."

The American Red Cross also is looking for volunteers.

Volunteer coordinator Reshy Gomes said the agency needs office assistants, volunteers for the First Aid Unit and Disaster Action Team and people to help paint and put in shelves.

The need for volunteers increases during the holiday season, Gomes said, because many of the steady volunteers go on vacations. This year, Gomes said the need has increased since Sept. 11, but so have the number of people willing to help.

Bramhall said she agreed. "It just seems like everyone's ready to volunteer this year," she said.

And it's a good thing, she said, since the need also is higher.

Harsh said he is confident Manhattan residents will come through.

"The Salvation Army is so grateful for Manhattan," he said. "This is a great, great community."

U.S., Russia talks focus on nuclear weaponry

BY RON FOURNIER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bush pledged Tuesday to slash the United States' nuclear arsenal by two-thirds, to as few as 1,700 warheads, and Russian President Vladimir Putin said he might respond in kind. The leaders failed to agree on Bush's missile shield plans.

In private talks and then in an East Room news conference, the leaders opened a three-day visit that will focus on the budding U.S.-Russian alliance against terrorism and nagging differences over the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty.

"The position of Russia remains unchanged," Putin said of his government's objection to scrapping the treaty that bars national missile defenses.

The talks move Wednesday to Bush's ranch in Crawford, Texas, where U.S. officials had hopes for accord on the missile shield issue.

Both leaders indicated their relationship had buried vestiges of the Cold War.

"Together, we're making history as we make progress," Bush said. "We're transforming our relationship from one of hostility and suspicion to one based on cooperation and trust."

In his fourth meeting with the U.S. president, Putin urged his own citizens to stop looking at American relations from the old standpoint,

Holidays made meaningful through giving back to community

The holiday season is a time to be thankful and a time to give. Spending time with family and gift-giving are fun rituals observed during the season.

How can your holiday become more meaningful? By taking time to give back to the community. This holiday season, there are many more in need than have been in the past.

The Flint Hills Breadbasket already has 2,500 requests for free Thanksgiving dinners.

This is a substantially higher number than those in need last year. Between the current economic slump and many giving to the New York relief fund, it is important for us to remember those who need help locally.

Please take some time this holiday season to donate food, ring the bell for the Salvation Army or volunteer your time to a local charity. The difference you might make could be greater than you realize.

We all have so much more than we know. Maybe the true key to enjoying this holiday season is starting a different ritual and giving to those who need it the most.

Paying dues

Tuition hikes would benefit deserving professors

Line art by Adam Hayes/Collegian

Well, I was planning on writing this column on the virtues of brother-sister marriage, but since there was such an overwhelming response last week against such an idea, I decided to scrap it.

my view
John V. Graham

However, I will stick with an unpopular topic, as has been my habit all year. I'm writing to support the proposed tuition increases.

Many of you probably are reacting to that statement with shock. The idea of a college student in favor of a tuition increase is the equivalent of President Bush telling a room of rich people he's in favor of raising taxes.

Or, if you're slightly more cynical, it's the equivalent of President Clinton walking into a room and telling the truth.

First of all, I realize most college students scrape by on odd jobs just to pay the rent and, if they're lucky, have enough cash to go to Aggieville on the weekends.

The thought of having less money because of a rise in costs is hard for many to digest.

It's important to note that I am one of those poor college kids. Believe me, they don't pay me well here at the Collegian to write these enlightening columns. If you don't believe me when I tell you I'm poor, just ask my girlfriend.

When it comes to cooking dinner for her, my funds only will allow a gourmet dinner of ramen noodles with a piece of toast (if she's lucky).

However, when the rise in the cost of tuition is for an extraordinarily good reason, we should be in favor of it. That begs the question of what's classified as an extraordinarily good reason. Is it expanding the football stadium?

How about building more parking lots? Should we pay to tear down ugly buildings so we can have a better view of the library?

The answer to all of these questions is no. They're not good reasons to increase the cost of tuition. I'll admit, they'd all be really nice things to have, but they aren't why we're here at this university.

This university's very existence is to provide students with the best education possible. Therefore, the only good reason to raise tuition is to enhance this. Having quality, experienced professors and better equipment adds value to our education.

So, we should support any tuition increases that will obtain (or hold onto) superior professors and valuable equipment.

The powers that be are proposing tuition increases in order to raise teachers' salaries. I say, it's about time. It's amazing that we're even able to get professors here in the first place. Don't get me wrong — I love Manhattan. But this surely isn't the most exciting place to live. Let's at least pay our professors a salary that's equivalent to what they'd make elsewhere.

If I've learned anything in my four years with the College of Business Administration, it's that employees are a company's most important asset. The bottom line is — in order to have the best students, you need the best professors.

Is it fair that some students, namely those in engineering and business, would have to pay more? As a business student, I don't care if it's fair or not.

The most important thing to me is that we get the best professors possible. If it means we have to pay more for them, so be it.

Why business and engineering? Because those are two fields that are the hardest for a university to lure away from private industry. Imagine if you were a student who has just graduated with a master's degree in business administration. Would you take a significantly lower salary to become an instructor at a college, or would you try and make the most money you could with a company? The answer for most people is elementary.

Remember, the old adage is true — you get what you pay for. I'm all in favor of paying more for getting a better education, aren't you?

End of semester not end of healthy choices

It's that time of the semester again.

The stress is mounting. Suddenly, 24 hours in one day doesn't seem like enough time to accomplish it all.

For some students, this is the time of the semester when they start cutting out activities they deem unimportant.

Yet, the things that often take the backseat should not be ignored. Things such as eating right, exercising on a regular basis and practicing a form of spirituality are some of the most important elements in our daily lives.

Do you remember hearing how important breakfast is? That is because it is.

It literally can set the tone for the rest of the day. In the Sunday issue of Parade magazine, Dr. Isadore Rosenfeld wrote about the necessity of this meal. He wrote, "Your brain needs glucose to function well. During the night, while you're fasting, there's less glucose available, continuing your all-night fast in the morning deprives the brain of the energy it needs and slows your mental performance until your next meal."

If you are like me and wake up 20 minutes before class starts, time does play a factor in this meal or lack thereof. That is where the beauty of Slimfast energy bars, cereal bars and fresh fruit can come into play.

Regardless of how busy you are, make time to eat. Working out is another element a lot of students eradicate when things pile up.

Exercising has numerous advantages. It helps lower stress and increase energy levels. Even if you don't have time to go to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, take a few moments to do sit-ups, go on a quick jog or a brisk walk. When you sit for a long period of time, it slows circulation and fatigues muscles.

The Mind Tools Web site has information about the advantages of exercising. It says exercising is vital because it improves blood flow to the brain, which brings additional sugars and oxygen to a person. This can be used when thinking. Exercising also can release endorphins, which provide a feeling of happiness.

Self magazine offered a few tips on helping to reduce stress-related headaches.

One of those tips was enlarging the font size when working on computers. The article stated, "You should be able to read you're screen when you're three times farther from your monitor than you usually sit."

Another tip is to have a sexual fantasy. According to research at John Hopkins University, fantasizing has been proven to lessen pain.

Spirituality is extremely important as well. There are so many forms of this, it would be unjust for me to focus on just one. Everyone's muse is different. However, the function of connecting is extremely important. It gives focal point to people's lives. Thus, it provides a center for people to return to when everything else seems to crumble around their Adidas.

Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week scholarship will not be cut

Editor,

In last Thursday's recap of Student Senate, there was a big mistake about the EOF (educational opportunity fund).

The article stated that Danny Callahan recommended to take money from a Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week scholarship to fund the Vet Med Tutoring Program.

In fact, he recommended no such thing. His proposal was to fund the scholarship at the same amount it had been this year.

This seemed plausible to him and other members of the body because in a year of cuts, doubling REHW Scholarships seemed counterintuitive.

He proposed that the REHW scholarships retain 100 percent of their current allocation (as opposed to 200 percent) and that Vet Med Tutoring receive less than 50 percent of their request.

So, in reality, the REHW scholarship still would have been immune to the year of cuts, and no program would have been diminished under Callahan's proposal, as last Friday's article led one to believe.

the spacious $1 million Academic Learning Center — completed at the Vanier Sports Complex in 1996 — should give student-athletes a positive K-State experience.

Aside to this primary long-term goal, however, Weiser said he has a host of short-term objectives that have risen to the forefront.

FINANCIAL BUDGET

Weiser said one of his immediate concerns stems from financial questions regarding the athletics department, despite upping the budget from $23 million to $27 million since his arrival.

"I clearly feel concern and pressure about the day-to-day operations from a financial standpoint," Weiser said. "I think we're on a very fine line financially and we constantly have to look at maximizing revenues and minimizing our expenditures."

To do this, Weiser is in the process of streamlining the department, uniting the Bramlage operation with the rest of athletics. In the past, the Bramlage operation was a separate staff of 10 to 12 individuals that was exclusively Bramlage-focused.

"We're going to meld those into one, because we think there's some economies of scale, duplication of services — those things that can kind of help us trim down, perhaps, some of the expenses," Weiser said.

Charlie Thomas, director of Bramlage, said he supports Weiser's efforts to combine the two operations, adding efficiencies to the department.

"Change is change," Thomas said.

"You can be scared of it or you can look at it in a positive light, and I think this is a case where you make something positive out of it."

BASKETBALL REVENUE

With Weiser's ever-going concerns regarding the financial side of the athletics department, he said his goal simply is to keep pace with increased costs, primarily regarding salaries and scholarships. However, he said budget growth and the growth of basketball have a very distinct correlation.

"If we are able to take the next step financially," he said, "it's going to happen because we've been able to grow the basketball programs the way we want to."

And frankly, Weiser said, he can't see why such growth is not possible. He said he feels both the men's and women's squads have the best combination in terms of coaching and athletic talent.

He just needs fan support.

"I know a lot of people are like, 'Oh, it's never going to be like Ahearn.' And it won't be," Weiser said, "in terms that Ahearn is a special environment and a special design, and facilities like that don't exist, for the most part, anymore. You see more of a Bramlage-type setup."

"That doesn't mean it can't still develop its own tradition and history, and it comes from winning."

Nonetheless — basketball growth or not — Weiser's track record shows past success in dealing with financial situations. He tackled an even greater challenge while at Colorado State.

After taking over the Rams' AD job in 1997, he discovered he'd inherited an athletic program drowning in a $500,000 deficit.

Not only did he right Colorado State's financial situation, but he upped the budget from $9 million to $13 million in three years.

THE NATIONAL OUTLOOK

Though the innerworkings of K-State's athletics department might be Weiser's constant concern, he cited the necessity of keeping an eye on the national scene — paying attention to both the NCAA as a whole, as well as the Big 12 Conference operations.

"I think there are some — I don't want to say 'clouds on the horizon' — but some reasons for us to be very connected with what's taking place nationally in this business of intercollegiate athletics," Weiser said.

For instance, there's a strong likelihood that the NCAA will change requirements for Division I-A membership in the near future.

Such a school must incorporate a minimum of 14 sports, but that number soon will rise to 16.

Weiser said K-State is fortunate to fund 16 sports already, and further requirements for football in terms of attendance and home games played isn't a concern. But other potential requirements, such as the numbers of scholarships and sports sponsorships provided, is an issue.

Other national questions spring from the World Trade Center tragedy of Sept. 11.

Although Weiser said the incident has had more emotional repercussions so far, he predicts things, such as increased postage will pose difficulties in managing K-State's AD budget.

He said security issues at events also have been heightened, as well as nationally at airports, and the previously safe task of opening mail has been thwarted by anthrax scares.

"Although I can't put a financial number on it, I'm confident we will see some effect whether it's because of insecurity, increase cost of postage or travel," Weiser said. "By the time we finish our fiscal year, we'll see an uptake on that."

NCAA CERTIFICATION

Another immediate national concern for Weiser deals with K-State's recertification process, which will conclude next fall.

Several subcommittees have been formed, and NCAA accreditation meetings began Friday.

Weiser said K-State must complete a self-study evaluation based on the NCAA's criteria, examining academic and fiscal integrity, governance and rules compliance, and the commitment to equity, student-athlete welfare and sportsmanship.

This study then will be submitted to the NCAA, stating in which areas the school is doing well and others that need improvement.

Once this is complete, a group of peer review members will make a four-day visit to K-State's campus in fall 2002 to verify the self-study evaluation is accurate.

Weiser said he's been through several recertification processes in the past, seven as a peer reviewer and once as the athletics director at Eastern Michigan.

"I've had enough experience to know that it is a tremendous time commitment," Weiser said.

FACILITY ISSUES

One of Weiser's recurring short-term concerns deals with the sporting facilities at K-State. He said all 16 sports have these issues, but there are three specific ones being targeted.

K-State is in the process of replacing the turf at KSU Stadium, a roughly $1 million project; the school is wrapping up the renovations to Frank Myers Field, with the lighting system one of the few items left to be funded; and discussions have begun on revamping the track facility.

"This track has certainly become quickly a pet project of mine," Weiser said, "simply because we've got a track program, on the women's side anyway, that were the Big 12 champions last year."

"But yet, we have a facility out here that we can't hold a track meet, even if we wanted to. We need to bring our facility up to the level of success that the programs have here."

Weiser said the size of the infield must be increased by widening the track two lanes, and he also plans to lay a new rubber, urethane track and regrade and re-asphalt its base.

Weiser said the project will cost three-quarters to $1 million.

An east side grandstand and press box could also be later developments.

DEPARTMENTAL STRUCTURE

At any rate, tightening the athletics department's structure will save both time and dollars, Weiser said.

"I'm a big believer in allowing people to do their jobs, and I want to give our operation enough autonomy so that people feel like they can make decisions without necessarily having to come and say, 'Is this OK?'" Weiser said. "I want to develop that kind of atmosphere and organizational structure that allows people to make decisions and keep things moving."

Those plans, coupled with his background and expertise, make Weiser a quality fit for K-State athletics, president Jon Wefald said.

"He's been an athletics director at three different places," Wefald said, "so he's had the experience, the sense of professionalism and the ability to work with a variety of people — and with a vision as well."

BATTLE WITH THE BEARS

Mike Shepherd/Collégian

Freshman setter Gabby Guerre gets her hands on an Iowa State spike while senior middle blocker Jayne Christen backs her up.

Cats hope to defeat Baylor in Waco; victory would match seasonlong winning streak.

BY SEAN PURCELL

Kansas State Collegian

Riding a four-match winning streak, the K-State volleyball team will roll into Waco, Texas, today in hopes of taking care of the Baylor Bears.

Of course, that might be easier said than done.

The Bears fought K-State to the wire in their last meeting at Ahearn Field House, but the Wildcats finally prevailed in five sets.

Perhaps the two teams are establishing a tradition of barn burners. Last year, it was Baylor who edged the Wildcats in five games, so tough battles in this series have come as no surprise to head coach Suzie Fritz.

"They match up with us very well. They dig a lot of volleyballs, and they run things fast," Fritz said. "That is pretty comparable to what we do, so we are used to seeing the things we plan to see on Wednesday."

K-State also will have to deal with Baylor swingers Stevie Nicholas and Tatiana Kenon.

Fritz said the team did a good job of containing Nicholas in the last match, but will have to focus on limiting the production of both Bear bombers to be successful in Wednesday's match.

"It will be a challenge because they have two nice middles with a veteran setter, so they are a very nice team," Fritz said.

"But defensively, we have played consistently as of late, and if we play in system, we are capable of playing with anybody."

Veteran leadership has been called upon to fuel the Cats this season as well.

With just three matches to play, Fritz said the seniors know that now is the time to pace the players and lead them into the postseason.

"It's tremendously important for our seniors to play well because they only have a few games left," Fritz said.

"We want them to play great, and for the most part, they have. I know they are starting to feel that it is close to the end, and we want to end well and go as far as we are capable in the tournament."

Not looking ahead to tournament play is something that always is stressed in practice, Fritz said.

The Wildcats face three tough final matches and seem to control their own destiny as far as NCAA tournament seeding.

"If we take care of business, we are in," Fritz said.

"The team is very focused, and they have done a great job of staying on task and taking care of each opponent."

"We can't overlook Baylor and look at Texas A&M, because either team will come up and get us," she said. "Baylor is always a tough match for us, but I know the players are very prepared mentally for them."

A K-State win over the Bears would match its highest winning streak of the season, and the team's strong play lately might be a sign that the team is peaking, Fritz said.

Baylor also is hoping to peak, though, and with a win over the Cats, the Bears might springboard into the postseason picture themselves.

"I like where the team is at right now, and as a coach, you like to see that," Fritz said.

"But Baylor is going to play well at home. They always do. And with them trying to make the push for the tournament, it makes them a little scary."

Mimick earns conference honor with play against Colorado, Texas

BY DAN SMITH

Kansas State Collegian

Outside hitter Lisa Mimick was named the Big 12 Volleyball Player of the Week on Monday afternoon after leading K-State to wins over conference opponents Texas and Colorado last week.

"Lisa continues to play her best volleyball when it matters most," head coach Suzie Fritz said.

It was the second straight time a Wildcat earned the honor after teammate Carl Jensen won the title last week with impressive performances against Kansas and Iowa State.

Mimick, a 5-foot-11 senior from Spencer, Neb., led K-State with a team-high 20 kills on 425 hitting against the Longhorns on Wednesday in Austin, Texas. Mimick also added 14 digs and four blocks in the Cats' 30-22, 30-13, 27-30, 30-26 win over Texas.

It was the second time this season and the third time in her career that the Wildcat hitter has surpassed the 20-kill mark in a match.

On Saturday, against then-No. 21 Colorado, Mimick continued to play solid, turning in a 15-kill, 13-dig performance to record her 11th double-double of the season and the 23rd of her career against the Buffaloes. In addition, the senior fired three service aces and blocked four shots in the Cats' four-set upset (27-30, 30-25, 30-26, 30-18) of Colorado.

"She really played well in a tough environment at Texas, then she came out and was her consistent self in a big win over Colorado," Fritz said. "I'm happy that she finally received this honor because she has played well all season for us."

Recreation of basketball magic needs fan support

K-State students, prepare yourselves. I am going to take you back a couple of years into Wildcat history that might be a little hazy.

I am not talking about the year 1994, when K-State last beat the University of Kansas on the basketball court.

And, no, I am not talking about Askia Jones and his once-in-a-lifetime 62-point ballgame against Fresno State.

Let's go back in time a little farther into the early 1970s.

Picture this:

The date is Feb. 13, 1973.

It's three hours before tipoff, and hundreds of K-State students are in a crowded line near the entrance of Ahearn Field House. The majority have been waiting in line for hours. Students in the front had camped out for days.

The small garage door to Ahearn begins to lift, and the anxious fans begin to crowd the entrance. A couple of students barely escape the situation before being trampled on. The crowd then sprints in a mad dash to the mid-court seats closest to the floor. People start diving headfirst on top of the benches in efforts to save as many seats as possible.

It's a big game tonight.

No, 15-ranked K-State plays Kansas for the third time this season.

As the junior varsity game ticks down to its last minutes, Ahearn already is packed. The student section is filled to its limit.

Students in the front row are so close to the court they can feel the vibration of the dribbling basketball. They literally can get in the referee's face. You can't walk in front of the student section without stepping on the court.

As the KU players are introduced, the regular boos and jeers fill the arena and then, suddenly, a terrorized, screeching chicken is thrown on the court. Maintenance scrambles to grab the chicken as the students cheer.

The game features the versatile guard Lon Kruger, who would become the Big Eight Player of the Year (and who now is the NBA head coach for the Atlanta Hawks).

Seniors Steve Mitchell and Ernie Kunyer certainly would light up the scoreboard that night. Through the season, they averaged almost 30 points a game together.

And the team would be led by the respected and successful back Hartman.

Nerves, excitement and noise fill the air in Ahearn and echoes off its walls. The referee blows his whistle, the jump ball is thrown and the Cats would go on to beat KU that night 67-66. In the 1972-73 season, K-State would go on to be Big Eight Tournament Champions and reach the Sweet 16 in the NCAA tournament.

My dad still talks about the good of K-State basketball days. It was the time of K-State basketball. The players wanted it, Manhattan loved it and the students relished it.

Needless to say, basketball hasn't been the same at K-State for a while. But the willingness and desire to change the program is there. Head coach Jim Woodbridge has said he has visions for K-State to have both a strong football and basketball program.

There is potential is there, but it's not going to happen right away, what we can change now is our attitudes. If we need to start bringing livestock into the games, so be it.

Let's bring back the spirit of the past and get read for the upcoming season.

I know I am.

Runners advance to NCAA race

BY BEN FEHR

Kansas State Collegian

K-State and the Big 12 conference made a strong showing Saturday at the NCAA Midwest Region Cross Country Championships.

The men, who ran at Carbondale, Ill., saw senior Shadrack Kimeli, of Eldoret, Kenya, post a championship time of 30:37.3 on the 10,000-meter course.

The first-place finish marked Kimeli's first regional championship and earned the senior a berth in the NCAA National Championships to be in Greenville, S.C., on Nov. 19.

The men finished 16th in the field of 24 teams. The men's squad was anchored by Kimeli and also scored with Reid Christianson, 72nd in 32:32.8; Derek George, 101st in 33:13.0; Martin Boos, 127th in 34:09.1; and Mark Holcomb, who crossed in 136th place with a time of 34:26.0.

The women, who competed in the regional at Southern Illinois University, saw junior Amy Mortimer, a Riley, Kan., native, finish second overall with a time of 20:40 on the 6,000-meter women's course.

Mortimer, whose finish behind Oklahoma State's Siri Alheim also earned her a bid to the NCAA National Championships, was the two-time defending individual champion at the regional.

The Wildcat women had captured three straight team titles at the event, but finished in sixth place overall at Saturday's regional.

K-State scored with Mortimer; Amanda Crouse-Behnke, another national qualifier who finished in fifth place with a time of 21:02.4; Cate Holston, 38th in 22:16.0; Shauna Burrell, 74th in 23:02.4; and Jamie Thurman, who finished 89th with a time of 23:22.6.

Shadrack Kimeli runs in the race for Kansas State earlier in his career. Kimeli placed first in the 10,000-meter course run last weekend at the NCAA Midwest Region Cross Country Championships. He will compete in the NCAA race Nov. 19 in Greenville, S.C.

nationals with a number of individual efforts earning berths as well. On the women's side, defending national champ Colorado won the Mountain Region in Provo, Utah, and Oklahoma State won the Midwest region.

Along with Mortimer and Crouse-Behnke, Ann Marie Brooks of Missouri and Kara Newton of Baylor earned individual bids to represent the Big 12 at the national championships.

On the men's side, No. 1 Colorado won the Mountain region. Oklahoma State was runner up to Minnesota in the Midwest Region, and Texas was second only to defending NCAA champ Arkansas in the South Central Region.

The Colorado women will make their 12th showing, and 10th consecutive, at this year's nationals. Oklahoma State is making its fourth appearance on the women's side, its first since 1998.

In men's competition, Colorado was last year's national runner up. This will be the Buffaloes' 31st 10th straight appearance.

A matter of expression

Evan Semón/Collegian

The piece "Sarah" by Hillary Whalen is one of many media forms and ideas that compose the William T. Kemper Art Gallery's current exhibit in the K-State Student Union.

Art students reveal ideas through sculpture

BY BECKY FISCHER
Kansas State Collegian

A small, human form molded from aluminum sits across from a plastic army doll with his hand down his pants.

Water pours down a free-standing window, while next to it, large cast-iron teeth leave their mark on a limestone base.

Variety of media, forms and ideas compose the William T. Kemper Art Gallery's current exhibit in the K-State Student Union.

The only thing the pieces have in common is that they're made by students, said Dan Hunt, head of the Department of Sculpture.

"The show is varied in things such as concept and material because the pieces were created by varying personalities," Hunt said.

Carol Sprawka, senior in painting, is one of the contributing students. She said coming up with concepts can be the hardest part about creating.

"As an artist, you try to do something that's never been done before," Sprawka said. "When you think of all that's been done, it can get frustrating."

Once Sprawka has an idea, she said, the rest is easy.

"Everything happens really fast after that," she said. "Things come together quickly, and it doesn't take long before I've got a finished product."

For this exhibit, Sprawka created a piece titled "Weighted Down." It consists of a silver block, which rests atop a ring made of wood. Wood and silver are media Sprawka said she works with a lot.

"There's a nice contrast between the earthy qualities of the wood and the technical feel of the silver," she said. "The intricacies of the silver are brought out by the rough wood, too. They're a nice combination."

The media choice, along with the ring-shaped form, came from ideas Sprawka said she associates with marriage. The title also suggests certain aspects of a relationship.

"I like the piece because it's funny," Sprawka said. "I mean, when it's not true, the idea of being weighed down by a relationship is funny."

Sprawka said art always has appealed to her.

"I've been making art pretty consistently since I was 5," she said. "At one point, I wanted to try something else to make more money. So, the third time I came back to school, I was going to major in architecture. The first drawing class here at K-State was so hard I thought, 'No thanks. I'd rather starve.'"

After switching back to an art major, Sprawka said she feels she's at the right place.

"I love it. To me, making art is fun," she said. "I have a family, which takes up the majority of my time, but 100 percent of my free time goes to art."

Just as dedicated to art is Rod Wakefield, senior in art therapy.

"I'd say all of my time goes to working on art," Wakefield said.

The title of Wakefield's exhibited piece, "Fragile (No Me Fingas Ayi)," comes from a real-life experience, something Wakefield says he likes to draw ideas from.

"It's an inside joke," Wakefield said. "It means 'Fragile (Don't Touch Me There)' in Spanish. I used to live in California, and a few of us went to Mexico. That was the only thing we knew how to say, so we ran around saying it to everyone. We thought it was funny."

The title ties into the form of the artwork, too, Wakefield said.

"The guy is made of aluminum, but his neck is a spring," he said. "So it's like his fragile spot — his weak spot. People really have to look closely to understand what's going on."

Having other people enjoy his work is what Wakefield said he likes best about exhibiting.

"Art isn't just for the artist," he said. "It's for other people, too. I just want to make interesting objects that people can enjoy looking at."

Sprawka said she'd like to change the way people look at things through the work she exhibits.

"I aim to create a different perspective," Sprawka said. "Sometimes I try to do it, and sometimes it just happens. I think it's important to open people's minds to different ways of looking at things."

Comedian to perform Thursday at Union Station

BY COLBY GORDON
Kansas State Collegian

Comedian Louis Ramey, winner of the 1999 United States Comedy Arts Festival Jury Award for Best New Artist, will bring his style to K-State on Thursday.

Ramey will perform at 8 p.m. Thursday in Union Station in the K-State Student Union. Ramey said he mainly talks about politics, sex and dating in his act, and that he is funny because he is able to present rude things in a polite way.

He said he hopes audiences come away shocked and amused after seeing him perform, and that after comedians have been around a while, they know what is funny and what is not.

Ramey's performance on campus already is being anticipated by some students, such as Todd Lubacz, senior in graphic design, who said he wants to see the comedian in person.

"I saw his special on Comedy Central over the summer and thought he was a riot," he said. "I'm definitely looking forward to his performance here."

Union Program Council entertainment chair Megan Hughes said Ramey was chosen out of more than 20 comedians because UJC thought he would relate the best to a college audience.

Originally from Atlanta, Ramey said he got started in comedy because of a dare from one of his friends while he was in community college. While at a fashion show, Ramey took the dare to get onstage and start telling jokes. After that experience, Ramey fell in love with comedy.

Ramey's first television appearance was on "It's Showtime at the Apollo," and his career highlights include his own half-hour special on Comedy Central, touring and opening for Whitney Houston and appearing on Comedy Central's "Premium Blend."

Ramey has performed in front of as many as 8,000 people in Chicago and as few as 12 people in a hotel in Florida just before Hurricane Hugo hit the coast. Ramey said one of the most interesting performances he ever gave was at a federal prison in Alabama.

While he loves and enjoys being a comedian, Ramey said there is a negative side. People walking up and asking him to tell a joke and the lack of respect comedians get from the public are just two of the pitfalls, he said.

Event explores scholarships

BY EDIE HALL

Kansas State Collegian

Two K-State students walked away from the fifth annual Scholarship Workshop $200 richer.

Dustin Dyson, senior in animal science and pre-veterinary medicine, and Crystal Jacobs, freshman in accounting, won the drawing for the $200 scholarship that was a part of the Nov. 13 workshop, sponsored by the Office of Student Financial Assistance and Adult Student Services.

Besides the drawing, the workshop included a scholarship expo that students could browse to learn about college and community scholarships. Then students could attend a presentation by Nancy Bolsen, director of Adult Student Services; David Strohm, assistant director of Adult Student Services; and Tanya McGee, assistant director of the Office of Student Financial Assistance.

"We put on this event because students don't always know that there are other scholarships they can apply for outside the general K-State scholarships," Bolsen said.

Bolsen said students typically ask questions about deadlines and what scholarships are available for their specific major. She said they also might ask criteria to apply for certain scholarships.

Also provided at the scholarship expo were four computers available to students to apply for scholarships online.

The presentation covered such things as how to write a good scholarship application and the application process. Strohm said it is important for students to analyze their audience when writing an essay.

"Don't make it a factual, cold document," Strohm said. "Tell them who you are and what you are about."

It also covered preparing and searching for scholarships, and scholarship scams.

"Groups may contact a student and offer, for a price, to find scholarships that the student is eligible for and can apply for. The reason it's a scam is because the student can do this on their own by visiting an online scholarship search site."

Bolsen said there are things students can be doing year round to help them with earn scholarships. She said students need to find ways to earn them and use them to keep their grades up. She also said it is important for students to get involved on campus.

"People who fund scholarships are looking for students who are committed to others," Bolsen said.

Bolsen said that in past years, the workshop has drawn in more than 300 students.

Darin Guries, junior in management and pre-law, said he had received an invitation through the mail, and decided to attend the event.

"I wanted to find out about general scholarships at K-State and also get some information to use when applying for national scholarships," Guries said.

Guries said he found the workshop helpful.

"It's definitely a good event to come to," Guries said. "It really helps to inform students about scholarships and other financial assistance."

NUCLEAR

distrust and the enmity. On the question of allowing U.S. forces to use Central Asia as a base into Afghanistan, the Russian president said, "We have nothing to be afraid of."

Finding plenty of common ground, the leaders urged Afghanistan's U.S.-backed opposition fighters to use restraint while liberating the nation's capital of Kabul, and called for a broad-based, multi-ethnic, post-Taliban government. They brushed aside reports northern alliance forces were executing prisoners of war.

In a blizzard of paper, the pair formalized a series of agreements to combat bioterrorism, bolster the Russian economy, battle money laundering that finances terrorism and strengthen Russia's ties to NATO — the 19-member military alliance formed to counter Moscow in the Cold War.

It was the issue of weapons that underscored their greatest agreement and disagreement.

Bush, who promised in the presidential campaign to reduce significantly U.S. nuclear stockpiles regardless of whether Russia reciprocated, announced his intention to slash the nation's long-range nuclear arsenal to between 1,700 and 2,200 weapons over the next decade.

The United States has about 7,000 nuclear warheads. Russia has about 5,800, but can't afford to keep them.

Bush called his proposal fully consistent with American security.

Putin replied: "We appreciate very much the decision by the president to reduce strategic offensive weapons to the limits indicated by him, and we, for our part, will try to respond in kind."

U.S. officials said they were not disappointed that Putin failed to produce a specific level for Russian cuts. They noted that Putin has pushed to reduce both nations' stockpiles to 1,500.

There were small signs of discord.

Putin said he wanted the nuclear targets in writing, including the issues of verification and control. The U.S. president said it was enough that he had looked the man in the eye and shook his hand. But Bush said he would be willing put the agreement in writing.

On the ABM treaty, Bush hopes to persuade Putin to allow the United States to proceed with research and development of a missile shield without declaring the work a violation of the 1972 pact. In exchange, Bush promised Putin in their meeting to keep Russia informed of the tests.

U.S. officials said the proposal would give both men what they want — Bush could begin developing a missile shield, and Putin could tell his public that he kept the ABM intact. Putin said he was open to discussing the issue with Bush in Crawford.

"I believe that it's too early to draw the line on the discussions," said Putin, who had a full schedule in Washington, D.C., and Houston before joining Bush at the ranch late Wednesday. He was leaving Crawford on Thursday afternoon.

Bush told Putin last month in China that he was prepared to announce as early as January that the United States was pulling out of the ABM. The warning was designed to force Putin into a decision. The pledge Tuesday to unilaterally reduce U.S. nuclear arms is viewed as an incentive for Putin to compromise on the ABM.

chemotherapy. I got rid of the effects of chemo quicker. I think I rebounded a lot quicker."

Sellers said some people just can't relax.

"A massage will help them in one way or another, but some people just don't like to be touched.

They can't let go of things," he said.

He said massage therapy also has brought out repressed memories.

"I had a girl once and was finishing a massage on her head, neck and face," he said. "I touched her face, and she jumped off the table. I found out she had been abused. That's pretty sad."

Linda Harris, therapist, said she provides therapy for pregnant women to alleviate pain. Pregnancy is the most important time for a woman to have a massage.

Sometimes medical conditions do not allow massage therapy. Women carrying a child need to consult their doctor to make sure it is ok, she said.

Harris said massage therapy is also good for some infants.

"We give infant massages to colicky, fidgety, not sleeping babies. If they seem to have tension about them, massage is very beneficial. It also is good for kids that have ADD."

Harris said it is rewarding working with people and being able to give them a positive touch.

Harris said her specialty is working on neck, shoulders and lower back. She works with the sciatic nerve, the main nerve that branches from the spine and goes through the gluteals, down the leg. She said she relieves the pain when the nerve is inflamed.

"If it is impinged, it will cause excruciating pain," she said. "They can't bend over, and they can't walk."

Sellers said there are certain qualifications people should look for in a therapist.

He recommends looking for a masseuse with more than 500 hours of education. He said 250 hours is common, and that is good, too.

Look for a national certification for therapeutic massage and body work, he said. If they do not have that, see if they belong to a massage association. It is important to get a massage from someone who knows what they are doing.

Sellers said to look for a masseuse with similar problems.

"If you have a back problem, ask the therapist if they have the same back problems," he said. "They will know what feels good on their own back."

Building over budget;
needs private fundingBY KECIA N. SEYB
Kansas State Collegian

Construction of the three-story building beside Ackert Hall is going well, even though lack of funds will keep some parts from being finished until funds become available, officials said.

"The construction is looking really good," Ned Gatewood, associate university architect, said. "It's on schedule. We've had good weather. It's going very well."

The only setback is that the project did go over its budget of $11.4 million, Gatewood said, allowing only the Division of Biology and the center for basic cancer research to move in by April or May.

"We felt we could build the building for the architect's cost estimates, and when we bid the project, that simply was not the case," Gatewood said.

Parts of the Department of Biochemistry will have to wait to occupy the building until more funds become available.

Jerry Carter, director of facilities planning/university architect, said alternates were included in the bid, allowing the university to add sections to the finishing of the building if money allowed. With the construction's costs, however, the university was not able to accept some of those alternates.

"Cheney Construction, the general contractor, is moving full speed ahead to complete the work of the contract," he said. "The alternates that we could not afford are not going to be completed until we have the money to afford them. What we can't afford, we can't expect Cheney Construction to do the work for free."

The good news is that K-State has had some success in raising some private funds or gifts in kind, Carter said, but he cannot release the donors' names yet. He also said he is not positive when the funds actually will become available.

To explain the shortage of money, Carter compared this building's bids with the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex's bids.

"At that time, the bids were so fantastically low, we were able to do every possible thing we wanted to and still had money left over to buy the exercise equipment you use now as a student," he said. "The bidding has an ebb and a flow. That's just the nature of the business."

Consumer spending on riseBY JEANNINE AVERSA
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Consumers, drawn by favorable financing and heavy discounting, boosted retail sales in October by 7.1 percent, the biggest one-month gain ever recorded.

The jump in sales at the nation's retail stores came after consumers cut back on their spending in September, pushing sales down by 2.2 percent, the Commerce Department reported Wednesday.

Much of the strength in the October retail sales report came from a record 26.4-percent increase in car sales, which have been boosted by zero-percent financing and other incentives.

Consumers, whose spending accounts for two-thirds of all economic activity, have been a main force keeping the economy out of recession. But economic fallout from the Sept. 11 terror attacks probably have made a recession this year unavoidable, economists say.

In an effort to prevent the economy from sinking deeper into recession, the Federal Reserve has cut interest rates 10 times this year, with three of the reductions coming after the attacks.

Congress, meanwhile, is working on a plan to stimulate the economy through new tax cuts and increased government spending.

Commerce Secretary Don Evans, called October's retail sales report encouraging.

"It is a sign people are going to malls, shopping and participating in this economy," Evans said. "But we still have a long way to go."

The economy is very weak, underscoring the need for Congress to quickly pass a balanced plan to revive the economy, he said.

The economy shrank at a 0.4 percent rate in the third quarter and many economists are predicting an even bigger drop in the current quarter, thus meeting a common definition of a recession: two consecutive quarters of declining economic output.

With unemployment rising and fears about anthrax in the mail and further terror attacks, economists worry that consumers might pull back, making the economy even weaker.

Still, economists are hopeful the Fed's aggressive rate cuts, along with the economic stimulus being contemplated by Congress will lead to a rebound next year.

On Wall Street, the strong retail sales report lifted blue-chip stocks. The Dow Jones industrial average gained 26 points in morning trading but broader indices were down.

To revive sagging sales, retailers have heavily discounted merchandise and offered other incentives. Car makers and dealers have provided free financing, which was a big factor in soaring car sales last month, economists say.

The 26.4 percent jump in car sales in October followed a 4.5 percent decline in September.

Excluding car sales, overall retail sales in October rose by 1 percent.

Sales at clothing stores increased by 6.9 percent.

MHS responding to bomb threats

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Manhattan High School had received one bomb threat in the past three years. This year, the high school has received two, according to Manhattan-Ogden USD 383.

Michele Jones, media relations representative for the school district, said she does not know how genuine the first caller was, but the caller Oct. 3 might have just mimicked the first.

"Lots of times there is a copy cat effect," Jones said. "You get one, school gets out, and then someone else will try it to see if it will happen again."

"Our second one was three weeks after the first, which doesn't seem to fit the copy cat model, though."

Even though the district does not know why there have been more bomb threats this year, it will not ignore any future bomb threats, said Teresa Miller, principal of Manhattan High School.

"It's something we can't ignore," Miller said. "We have to take it seriously. We can't just say it is just another phone call and put it away and ignore it. There is always a possibility it could be real."

She said that in response to the threats, the school has tried to heighten security.

"We have increased awareness of unusual behaviors and people in the building without passes who shouldn't be here," she said. "Overall, we have increased security and are especially watching exits and entrances of the building."

Jones said the district also is taking some extra preventative measures.

After the first bomb threat in early October, she said all the administrators got together for a short session with the police chief for the Riley County Police Department.

She said the district redistributed copies of its crisis plan to not only every school, but also every classroom so everyone knows what to do during bomb threats.

About a week later, she said all of the school met for an informative training session to walk them through certain procedures that must be followed in future situations.

"Secretaries are usually the first person the caller speaks with," she said. "The police department told them the steps they needed to go through with a bomb threat."

The measures the district has taken would help in future situations, she said. "We're ready if another one happens," she said. "In school safety, you should always try to be ready because you never know when a crisis could happen. I certainly hope we don't have anymore."

Even though students got out of a day of school, the bomb threats upset students and faculty members, Miller said.

"They are mostly frustrated and upset," she said. "The students we have heard from would just like school to go on and everything to return to normal."

Jones said depending on how many snow days there will be this year, students might have to make up the lost day in May.

"We did stress to all those students that just because they were getting out that day didn't mean it was a free day. The time has to be made up," Jones said.

She said she agreed students are upset. Faculty and district members have handled the situation so well, though, she said students still feel safe.

"It was not necessarily a wakeup call, but the district and administrators handled it well," she said. "They did everything appropriately. Their actions and calmness helped diffuse any jitteriness that students had."

Seth Childs Cinema also has received two bomb threats this year, including one Monday evening. Management would not comment on the situation.

KSU searching for funds for new food safety labBY SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

Funding for K-State's proposed $40 million food safety lab still remains uncertain, officials said.

However, bioterrorism threats against the United States could make building the facility a national and state priority.

"The recent events certainly make the need for the building more critical, and that may help address the funding issue," Ron Trewyn, vice provost for research, said.

The lab, which would be a Bio Safety Level 3 facility, would be capable of studying biological threats, including anthrax, e coli, foot-and-mouth disease and cholera.

That doesn't necessarily mean K-State will study all these pathogens, though, said Jerry Jaax, associate vice provost for research compliance.

For now, K-State is in the process of searching for federal, state and private funds. But with a tight state budget, officials are not sure what funds will be available.

"It will be a very, very tight budget for all government agencies," said Kenny Wilk, chair of the House Appropriations committee. "If we could maintain the budget, that would be a success and a victory."

Sen. David Adkins, R-Leawood, said he hopes legislators can juggle the budget to serve the greatest needs.

"While I hope state money could be saved in some areas, there are other areas that we would like to look into giving money," he said. "State lawmakers have been very impressed with the work and human resources going on at Kansas State."

"In times of national crises, our universities have been places people want to invest in," Kansas Board of Regents Chairman Clay Blair said he agreed.

"We're optimistic because of the high priority being given to food safety in this state right now," he said. "The legislators have looked positively on that proposal."

The food safety lab is part of a larger proposal, though, which consists of money for aviation research at Wichita State University and life sciences research at the University of Kansas. It would cost $100 million to fund the entire bill.

Separating the food safety lab from the rest of the bill is not an option, Blair said. It only would hurt the universities' chances of receiving money.

"It's initially stronger collectively," he said. "Each one has a constituency that would be taken away if we separated them."

The food safety lab still could receive federal funds, possibly from anti-terrorism legislation.

Wolf Creek Nuclear Power plant practices evacuation

BURLINGTON — Workers at Wolf Creek nuclear power plant and neighboring emergency officials were to begin a drill Wednesday for a mass evacuation.

The drill has been planned for two years; federal regulations have required drills every six years, since the accident at Three Mile Island, Pa., in 1979.

The drills, two months after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, come at a time when nuclear plants are generating anxiety along with power.

Plant and emergency officials will practice a quick evacuation of all residents within 10 miles of the plant, and monitor radioactive fallout as far away as 50 miles. The specific accident scenario is kept secret until the day of the drills, which are expected to last two days.

Wolf Creek is about 120 miles northeast of Wichita.

Salina man pleads guilty in drug trafficking case

TOPEKA — A Salina man pleaded guilty Tuesday in a drug trafficking operation, U.S. Attorney Jim Flory said.

Adam G. Guzman, 20, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to possess with the intent to distribute 500 grams or more of methamphetamine. He faces a minimum of 10 years and a maximum of life without parole in federal prison when he is sentenced Feb. 2.

Flory said Guzman and co-defendants Francisco Banda, 25, and Michael T. Albers, 26, both of Salina, were involved in a large-scale operation to distribute meth in the Salina area from Oct. 2, 1999, to April 17, 2000.

Banda and Albers already have pleaded guilty to the same conspiracy charge. Albers was sentenced Nov. 2 to 12 years and seven months without parole. Banda's sentencing is scheduled for Dec. 14.

KU student writes book on terrorist attacks, children

LAWRENCE — A University of Kansas psychology student has written a book for worried children after struggling to talk to her own son and daughter about the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Leigh Kelly hopes the recently completed book, "Safe Space," will spark conversations between parents and children.

"Basically, we have a whole nation of traumatized children," said Kelly, 35, who has a 7-year-old son and 14-year-old daughter.

Her collaborator, 41-year-old illustrator Teresa Kelley, said the book kind of gives you a base to start with. It opens the door for them to talk about their feelings.

The book, which also includes artwork from fifth-graders at Northview Elementary School in Olathe, uses a poem to urge worried children to use deep breathing exercises and imagine they are in a safe space where nothing can hurt them.

NATION IN BRIEF

By The Associated Press

Lapses in security checks prominent issue at hearing

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Fewer than 10 percent of checked bags at the nation's airports are inspected for bombs and one overworked detection machine operator was found falling asleep on the job, the Transportation Department's inspector general said Wednesday.

"That's really stunning," Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., chairman of the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee, said at a hearing on aviation security since the Sept. 11 attacks.

Inspector General Kenneth Mead told the hearing that despite some strong measures to tighten security in the past two months, there still are alarming lapses related to both the system and the personnel who operate it.

He was backed up by Federal Aviation Administration head Jane Garvey, who said it was disturbing that, despite attempts to improve security, there continue to be failures to properly screen and detect weapons at security checkpoints.

Ales Pelikáni
Czech Republic

"There are opportunities to many people, and they are all so nice."

International student likes friendliness of university

BY TINA DEINES

Kansas State Collegian

Friendliness of people in Kansas is an aspect of America that international student Ales Pelikáni of the Czech Republic will remember when returning to his homeland.

Pelikáni, a civil engineering student, will spend one semester studying at K-State and then return home to finish his studies.

He said studying abroad is something he has wanted to do for a long time to broaden his knowledge.

"What is most important to me is improving my English," Pelikáni said. "Also, I think it is necessary today to know about other cultures."

He said he has met some nice people, including international students and Americans since coming to Manhattan.

"That's another great thing about being abroad," Pelikáni said. "There are opportunities to meet many people, and they are all so nice."

The experience at K-State has been particularly beneficial to Pelikáni, he said, because K-State offers a good program in his area of study.

"I think there is more busy work, like homework, at home," Pelikáni said. "I like some of the subjects I have to take here more than at home. It has been a good experience for me."

Pelikáni said that although he hasn't noticed any large differences between the Czech Republic and the United States, but has noticed some in architecture. He also said everything is bigger in America, such as the Kansas countryside.

Although Kansas wasn't his first choice, Pelikáni said he is happy to be here.

"I wanted to go to Denver, so I could be closer to the mountains, but the exchange program with my school was canceled," he said. "That's okay though, because I like it here very much."

Adviser helps women in pregnancy crises

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Volunteering at Life Choice Ministries as a 1989 college student convinced Amy Wichman, secondary education major, to pursue a different profession and work at the pregnancy crisis center.

Wichman has been the center's part-time assistant director since she received her bachelor's degree from K-State in 1992.

"As I really evaluated what was important to me, I couldn't imagine not being involved in some type of crisis pregnancy ministry," she said. "Knowing I have helped someone at a point of need, at a point of crisis, and helped them to make a good decision is important to me."

Women visit the center for a variety of reasons. The ministry, a private non-denominational Christian facility, provides free pregnancy testing and adoption services. Center workers advise those women offering information on birth control, adoption, and they also can discuss abortion options.

She said she does not claim to be a licensed counselor or social worker. Her advising never should replace professional help, she said.

"Sometimes they just need someone to listen to, and I am here for them," she said. "I present them with information. It is not my job to make decisions for them."

She said her work is rewarding, but it is difficult to deal with the women's painful situations at times, she said. It is never easy, she said, to listen to someone talk about a crisis pregnancy because they have been raped or might be considering an abortion.

"When I used to volunteer, there were days I drove home crying the whole way because of things at the office," she said. "If I have had a difficult day, I will pray and ask God to help that person. I will pray that He would just show that person love and help them in whatever decision they are making."

Joy Bullock, the executive director of Life Choice Ministries, said she hired Wichman because of her ability to relate to clients one on one.

"When someone comes into the center, they typically are experiencing a crisis situation," professionals in the COMMUNITY is a series profiling professionals who have positions K-State students are working toward.

Who: Amy Wichman
Job: Assistant director at pregnancy crisis center

she said. "It takes a particular talented individual to be able to take someone in a crisis and help them feel better about their situation by the time they leave."

"Amy has good listening skills and helps them look at their situation in a more positive light."

She said Wichman's educational background has not hindered her performance at the center.

"She is a talented, young woman who can do anything she puts her mind to. Period," she said. "If you are seeking to hire someone in this position, you would look for people who have degrees in social work or human ecology areas, but in this case, it doesn't mean those people are the best for the job. Amy was the best for the job."

She said she also coordinates adoptions at the ministry. Her role in an adoption is much like an expectant mother, she said.

"It's bittersweet," she said. "There is an element of sadness. It's not a happy thing to release your child for adoption, but there are lots of other neat and happy things that happen through the process."

"The birth mother is able to make other life plans. The baby is able to be raised in a two-parent home, and the couple has a child that they most likely couldn't have had on their own."

Wichman lives in Clay Center with her husband and two children, but travels to Manhattan to work at Life Choice. She said the best benefit of working parttime at the center allows her to fulfill her most important role.

"I treasure the time I have at home with the kids," she said. "I spend good time with them, and I am glad I am taking care of them while I can."

"Later on when they're grown, I can work fulltime again."

Parents visit schools for Education Week

BY MICHAEL WATSON
Kansas State Collegian

This week, Manhattan public schools will update parents on their child's progress in school as part of American Education Week.

The week's theme, "Together: Making Public School Great for Every Child," intends to remind people that teaching and learning is a team effort between home and classroom. Nancy Knopp, board of education president, said.

"Having one week helps us focus our thoughts," she said.

"A lot of people are responsible in educating our children. We remember that during American Education Week. It's not just the teachers we celebrate, but it's also the facilities, the secretaries and the whole group that helps with education."

American Education Week, Nov. 11-17, is the time to celebrate this work, she said.

A display about Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 schools can be viewed at Manhattan Town Center today and Friday. The display includes student artwork, thank you posters done by students and facts about the district's students.

In addition to the art work on display, Veterans Day was a celebrated holiday for the school district. Michele Jones, coordinator of communications and public relations, said a lot of schools participated in Veterans Day festivities Monday. Students marched in the parade and competed in poster, banner and essay contests.

"I think the whole entire school of Woodrow Wilson was marching in the parade," she said.

"It was a really big day," Katha Hart, principal of Woodrow Wilson Elementary School, said all 230 students marched in the parade. The second- and third graders did a little extra, performing in a patriotic music program to honor veterans.

Frank V. Bergman Elementary School also participated in the parade.

"All fifth- and sixth grade students marched in the Veterans Day parade. It was definitely part of the festivities," Joan Spiker, principal, said. "Students made a lot of posters for the event. Veterans visited their classrooms to share the history responsible for celebrating Veterans Day."

"Everyone is a lot more aware of the people who have served our country."

Spiker said she hopes families will attend the Site Council at 7 tonight in the Frank V. Bergman library. Each year, schools report their demographic and scoring information in subjects like math, science and social studies. They are revealing and discussing those statistics at the meeting. There also is a PTA pizza supper and bingo night for families from 5:30 p.m. to 7:30 p.m. Friday in the school gymnasium.

Spiker said American Education Week is not the only time parents can visit the school, and encouraged parents to visit schools throughout the year.

"We hope that parents know they can visit any time," she said. "There is an open invitation."

Legislature should fund, support proposed food safety lab

The Kansas Legislature should allocate money for the $40 million food safety lab at K-State.

K-State has wanted to implement this project for some time. It originally was proposed in 1999 at $80 million, but has been reduced to $40 million. The construction of the food safety lab is something all K-State students should stand behind.

This lab will be a bio safety facility and will be capable of studying biological threats, including anthrax, e coli, foot-and-mouth disease and cholera. The recent anthrax scare has shown the nation is in need of a top-notch research facility.

The proposed lab is a part of a larger proposal sitting at the Regents door. The $100 million proposal calls for money for aviation research at Wichita State University and life sciences research at the University of Kansas and our food safety lab. If this bill passes, all three of these research initiatives will begin.

This proposal not only will bring a nationally needed facility to K-State, but will enhance the international reputation of the university, enable the better recruiting of faculty and students, attract economic development to the state and create jobs.

But it also will make K-State known for something more than our football, architecture and engineering programs. We will be known for research and protection against bio-terrorism.

To the "ATOs" who we know were really disguised TKEs, you guys sure can belt out a hell of a Christmas carol midnight.

I love it when the little hamsters talk to me.

If the cost of tuition goes any higher, I am going to have to write a book titled "The Seven Days of Ramen."

I want to know when the Campus Fourum turned into a personal ad.

My roommate likes to eat pork and beans on ice cream.

To the girl in my sociology class who answers every single question, will you marry me?

I don't want to get off on a rant here, but whoever called in and said Dennis Miller is not good, he sucks.

To the guy who is transferring out of engineering, maybe you should open your eyes.

Lasting leftovers

Thanksgiving food provides history, enjoyment

One week from today, many of us will gather around the respective dinner table, giving thanks for all that is good in our lives.

As I express my gratitude for cartoons, thrift stores and bathroom doors that swing out (sadly, there are too few of these), I realize my list might not coincide with the majority of the populous. However, there is a universal good we must all give thanks for — food. Food provides not only sustenance, but comfort and happiness on a particularly dreary day. Or any day, actually, in my case.

So, in honor of a universal good and the day that pays homage to the Great American Feast, I give you, the reader, a list of facts concerning the noble turkey, cranberry and pumpkin, three foods without which Thanksgiving would just be a day of parades and football.

Susan Powell

As you cut into your Butterball next Thursday, take a moment to reflect on the unique nature of the bird. It is a very finicky bird, turkeys are prone to have heart attacks. When the Air Force would conduct test runs and break the sound barrier, fields of turkeys suddenly would drop dead.

If feeling particularly morose, a turkey can drown itself by looking up when it's raining.

The fleshy skin that hangs from the base of a turkey's beak down to its neck is called its snood. (So, it's not just a computer game to you anymore, eh?).

Wild turkeys have excellent vision and hearing (to make up for the accidental drownings, I suppose). Their field of vision roughly is 270 degrees, and they can run at speeds up to 20 miles per hour. Benjamin Franklin lobbied for the stealthy turkey to become our national bird, feeling the bald eagle was too cowardly. www.aristotle.net

If turkey isn't your bird of choice, or you consider eating meat a murderous act, well, let's move on to the fruits.

American Indians put the cranberry to use long before the pilgrims arrived in the 1620s. They believed cranberries had medicinal value and were used to draw poison from arrow wounds. Cranberry juice also was used as a natural dye for blankets and clothing.

The Delaware Indians in New Jersey regarded the cranberry a symbol of peace.

During the period of early American nautical exploration, U.S. ships carried cranberries. Sailors would consume the fruit to prevent scurvy, since it is a rich source of vitamin C.

The word 'cranberry' arose from 'crane berry,' the title given the fruit by German and Dutch settlers. When the vines bloom and the flowers' petals twist back, they resemble the head and bill of a crane. Hence, cranberry. www.teachervision.com.

Another great fruit associated with Thanksgiving is the pumpkin (yes, it really is a fruit. Seriously. Look it up). Although we celebrate the pumpkin in pie form, it was not always so. In fact, in colonial times, the pumpkin was used only as an ingredient for the crust of pies, not the actual filling. Sad.

Besides the makings of a tasty crust, pumpkins were once used to remove freckles and cure snake bites.

Pumpkins range in size from less than a pound to more than 1,000 pounds, the largest recorded being 1,140 pounds. Ninety percent of their weight is water.

The word 'pumpkin' is derived from 'pepon,' the Greek word for 'large melon.'

www.urbanext.uiuc.edu,
We natives of the Western hemisphere should come together and rejoice in the glory of these foods — all natives as well.

If nothing else, as Thanksgiving passes, may you be thankful for your newfound education of leftovers.

Mayor values student opinion, encourages city involvement

Being a K-State student means you are a citizen of Manhattan, with all the rights and responsibilities.

This weeklong focus on government provides an excellent opportunity for K-State students to find out how they can make a difference and be involved in local issues. I believe your quality of life most directly and significantly is affected at the local level. It is where you spend your daily life, where needs are met and usually where any state or federal programs actually touch you.

Your involvement can range from simply going about daily life using the services and resources without much thought as to how they are provided, to the complete immersion in city issues and decision making achieved by former K-State student and city commissioner (1995-1997) Justin Kastner.

The extremes of this continuum can be filled in through many options. The city commission legislative meetings and work sessions are televised on local cable guest view

Bruce Sneed

channel 3 every Tuesday.

Our award winning Web site, www.ci.manhattan.ks.us, offers agendas and information on all aspects of city government, including regularly scheduled items and special projects, such as the current process updating our comprehensive land use plan. You can track these issues by registering with our in-touch e-mail system, which automatically will contact you with the latest schedule, developments or information.

Common questions can be answered by our customer service staff, in person or on the phone. If you are interested in contributing more, you can fill out a volunteer form for potential appointment to one of over 25 advisory boards and committees, providing guidance and input to the City Commission. Our annual citizen's academy provides an in-depth experience covering all aspects of city governance. And you can contact the mayor or other City Commissioners with your concerns via phone, letter or e-mail.

When students express their concerns in an organized way, they are a major interest group with clout. Past Student Governing Association leaders have led significant campaigns on no-smoking initiatives, transit system planning and rental inspection to name a few. While not always successful in the time frame of a four or five-year college residency in Manhattan, without the student voice, progress would be much more difficult.

Sometimes the only involvement you have occurs because of a problem, violation or lack of awareness. Following the law is essential for you and for those who serve you, whether they be landlords, city staff or local law enforcement. Open communication and a cooperative approach can help keep neighbor conflicts to a minimum. The golden rule works pretty well if we all follow it.

Many students bring a great volunteer spirit to various causes and projects in our city. Habitat for Humanity, Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc. and Cats for Cans are just a few of the programs that you help make successful by your contribution of time, talent and resources.

Your SGA officials and others participating on local task forces such as curbside recycling, transportation planning, and the city, K-State projects fund committee, reviewing and approving projects funded through tax dollars collected on campus. These projects include lighting and safety improvements, pedestrian pathways, street and intersection projects, campus recycling programs and more.

We value you as citizens and students and want your energy, experience and involvement in this, our community. Manhattan has a high quality of life because we all have a stake, can contribute, and many have done so to sustain that quality. I thank you for what you have done and will do, and I am ready to respond to any concerns or questions you have. Please feel free to contact me or others in city government if we can be of service.

Agency to change foreigner policies

BY SUZANNE GAMBOA
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Bush administration plans a large restructuring of the Immigration and Naturalization Service that would separate law enforcement and service duties.

The move would fulfill a campaign pledge by President Bush to reduce the long waits endured by people who apply for benefits such as naturalization or permanent residency. It also seeks to address deficiencies in how the INS tracks foreigners who enter the country.

Thirteen of the 19 hijackers in the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks entered the United States legally, but no entry records exist for the other six.

INS Commissioner James Ziglar was expected to announce the changes at a Wednesday afternoon news conference.

The restructuring comes as Congress is considering its own plans for remaking the agency, including one that would abolish the INS and create two new agencies. Critics in Congress say they field more calls from constituents about INS-related problems than other agencies.

The INS budget for processing applications has nearly quadrupled since 1994 to $500 million, and the staff has more than doubled to about 6,100, according to a General Accounting Office report issued in June.

But during the same time, the INS backlog on processing applications increased nearly fourfold to about 3.9 million, the GAO said. The GAO is an investigative arm of Congress.

Ziglar, who took over the agency in August, has said he wanted to divide the INS functions, but keep the agency intact.

Ziglar said separating the functions made sense because district managers whose INS experience is largely in enforcement might not place emphasis on service work and vice versa. The two functions should not be completely separated, he said, because at times they overlap.

These changes also can be made more quickly, because creating two separate agencies requires legislation, he said.

The changes will not require congressional approval, although the agency will need to inform Congress of transfers of money to support the changes.

House denies $7.2 billion to anti-bioterrorism efforts

BY ALAN FRAM
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The House Appropriations Committee rejected an attempt by Democrats Wednesday to boost anti-terrorism spending, and prepared for an effort by New Yorkers to defy the White House and provide $9.7 billion to help the city and other terrorist targets recover.

By a near party-line 34-31 vote, the panel defeated an amendment by Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., that would have provided $7.2 billion to counter bioterrorism, the spread of weapons of mass destruction and beef up other domestic security programs.

That money, and the funds the New Yorkers are seeking, would go beyond the $40 billion that Congress approved three days after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. President Bush has said he will veto any legislation that exceeds that initial $40 billion amount, arguing that enough money has been provided until lawmakers convene next year.

Democrats argued that more money is needed right now for dozens of programs aimed at buttressing domestic security. They also had a separate amendment that would increase defense and intelligence spending by $6.5 billion.

"In your heart, you know we're right," Obey, the top Democrat on the Appropriations panel, told Republicans, paraphrasing the 1964 campaign tag line of GOP presidential candidate Barry Goldwater.

But Republicans backed Bush's effort to hold off on new spending until later.

"There can only be one driver in this war," said committee Chairman Bill Young, R-Fla.

The only lawmakers crossing party lines in the vote on the Democratic amendment were the committee's two New York Republicans, Reps. James Walsh and John Sweeney. The two were hoping to create momentum for the New York funds by showing it was acceptable to vote to alter Bush's plans.

Most of the additional $9.7 billion the New Yorkers were seeking would be for New York, which bore the brunt of the terrorist attacks. But some of the funds would be available for Virginia, Pennsylvania and New Jersey, where many victims of the World Trade Center destruction lived.

Walsh was hoping that would help him win broad enough support to prevail.

Bush controls how half the $40 billion will be spent. By voice vote, the committee approved details of how the other $20 billion would be spent, using it to strengthen the military, hire border patrol agents, improve the FBI's computers, help workers displaced by the attacks, and take other steps. Those details largely followed a proposal Bush had already submitted to Congress.

Recycle day calls for 'taking your tops off'

BY GABRIEL BREAZEL
Kansas State Collegian

Reduce, reuse, recycle and don't forget to take your top off.

Students for Environmental Action will be host to "Take Your Top Off" from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. today at the K-State Student Union Plaza.

The demonstration will show what materials the K-State campus recycles. SEA wants the campus to be educated on campus recycling and how it is done. For example, plastic bottles deposited in campus recycling bins cannot be recycled until their caps are removed.

The demonstration is coordinated with the fifth annual America Recycles Day, which is a nationally recognized day for pledging to recycle and to raise recycling awareness.

In addition to demonstrations, America Recycles Day contest entry postcards will be available from SEA. Residence halls also have entry postcards available. These cards ask for a recycling pledge and can be returned to SEA members at the demonstration or mailed for drawing entry. National, regional and local prizes will be awarded around Dec. 15.

Promoting recycling awareness is not a new thing for K-State's campus. In 1998 and 1999, the university's student body president challenged the campus to recycle on America Recycles Day.

Now, the SEA is promoting its campaign "Take Your Top Off" to bring awareness to on campus recycling.

Renee Bayard, freshman in music, said she tried to find a recycle location to deposit a bag of mixed recyclable bottles, but she couldn't find a place on campus or in Manhattan to deposit it.

"Public education — that's what's really important," said Diana Sjogren, senior in marketing and international business and SEA president. "Once a person is educated and a system is setup, recycling is easy. You just do it. It's a matter of changing habit."

K-State has a campus recycling program. It is coordinated through the university's custodial department and receives no funding from the university. Instead, the program makes its own funding through recycling and a grant from the Bureau of Waste Management/Kansas Department of Health and Environment.

On campus, the recycling program maintains 15 outdoor recycle bins for deposit of newspaper, plastic No. 1 PET containers and aluminum cans. The recycle bins are close to trash bins. Some residence halls also participate in recycling.

In 2000, the campus program's Web site reported they recycled 328 tons of material.

Each ton of material recycled by the program becomes cash for the program. Instead of K-State paying land fills, K-State pays the program the equivalent cost of land filling waste for recyclables.

However, prices for recyclables have dropped and the program's grant ends soon, John Woods, director of facilities services, said.

SEA is working toward the establishment of a sustainable recycling program on campus as a new and separate division with an environmental coordinator. Once the organization has collected 1,000 petition signatures, the signatures will be presented to President Jon Wefald as a show of student support for a new recycling program.

SEA members assisted in collecting nine tons of computers for recycling and local donation from campus Nov. 7 and hope to assist faculty and staff in cleaning out offices of recyclable material for America Recycles Day.

Sjogren said reusing materials is an intelligent reason to start recycling.

"It just makes so much sense," she said.

Baseball needs all its teams

my view

Michael Noll

Major League Baseball is playing a game of Russian Roulette, and it just keeps pulling the trigger.

After the 1994 players' strike, many thought baseball finally would learn its lesson and straighten up. It turned out that fans were bigger idiots than the owners and players, who nearly ruined the game.

Amazingly, the fans eventually returned to games.

Now, Bud Selig, baseball's commissioner then and now, is at it again. This time, he is making plans to eliminate two major league baseball franchises in order to correct his and the owners' mistakes in the past.

Selig believes that by alienating two cities and thousands of baseball fans across the nation, he will be able to increase team parity and decrease player salaries and ticket prices.

This time, the fans might be gone for good.

The three franchises atop the list for elimination are the Minnesota Twins, the Montreal Expos and the recently added Tampa Bay Devil Rays, all of which have struggled in recent years and are located in small television markets.

On the surface, the plan makes sense — weed out the dead weight.

Before Selig starts axing any franchises, though, he should take a good, hard look at his own Milwaukee Brewers. No team has been as futile in recent years as the Brewers, who have suffered more consecutive losing seasons than any team in baseball. The Brewers also rank among the worst teams in attendance. The only reason Milwaukee's employees aren't cleaning their desks off into boxes is that Selig is the team's former owner and remains part of the management.

The Montreal Expos are hapless, sure, but even they were good in 1994. In that year, baseball was having its best season in memory, as were the Expos, who had the best record in baseball.

At the time, the Montreal organization possibly was the best-run in the majors. Working with a minuscule budget and a relatively small market, the Montreal management developed its farm program and eventually was rewarded with talented players, all of which are present or recent stars — Marquis Grissom, Moises Alou, Wil Cordero, Larry Walker, Pedro Martinez and John Wetteland.

These players helped Montreal dominate the National League in 1994. Then, the players' union went on strike, ending the season early. When the strike finally ended — without a salary cap or revenue sharing — every one of the young, talented players left Montreal within a couple years.

Selig could have avoided the entire contraction issue seven years ago by refusing to allow the players back on the field without a salary cap and revenue sharing. Had he done that, baseball today would have far more equity among teams.

Instead, Selig and several powerful, rich owners quibbled among themselves and gave into the players, which resulted in very little change after the strike.

As a result, one of the oldest franchises in baseball is facing the chopping block.

The Twins easily have shown more potential to win and draw fans than the Brewers. Minnesota actually led its division before the All-Star break. Milwaukee hasn't shown life since Hall of Famer Robin Yount played, and it wasn't exactly great then.

What's even worse is that the baseball hierarchy is trying to sneak its contraction plan

FINDING her way

Josie McClellan and Carissa Land row during the Sunflower Showdown at Tuttle Creek State Reservoir. The First Varsity 8 won their race, but the Cats lost to Kansas 13-12.

Rower finds more meaning in competition besides winning

BY JOEL REICHENBERGER
Kansas State Collegian

Josie McClellan never knew she wanted to be a rower. In high school, she tried everything. From running and biking to tennis and swimming — nothing ever seemed to fit just right.

"I was trying to find a niche in high school," she said. "I wanted to find something I was naturally good at."

Then fate intervened. Josie was competing in a triathlon in Topeka when she saw the word "rowing." It jumped out at her and immediately struck a chord in her life.

"I saw the word, and it just seemed right," she said.

Soon, after a few phone calls and a little investigation, McClellan found herself alone on Lake Shawnee trying to row for the first time.

Her first stroke was one she would never forget, and from it, she would never look back.

"I fell out of the boat after my first stroke," the K-State co-captain said. "But I still loved it from the beginning. By the time I got to shore, it was going much smoother."

Once she got the hang of it, she was hooked. McClellan contacted the novice coach at K-State, who was able to point her to a Topeka-area rowing club, and by the time she graduated high school and came to K-State, she was in love with the sport.

When she arrived in Manhattan, McClellan encountered a young team with only two seasons of varsity rowing under its belt. Many of her new teammates never had rowed before, but the freshman's intensity and passion helped lead the novice boat and direct the program toward a promising future.

"When I was a freshman in my novice boat, our goal was to be the varsity," she said. "We wanted people to look at us and see the varsity boat."

McClellan rowed with a purpose all year long that season. Since the first stroke that tossed her into the water years earlier, she had come a long way. She set a goal for herself to compete in the Olympics, and for the entire season every stroke she took was with that dream in mind.

That competitiveness and that passion seems to separate McClellan from her competition, crew Coach Jenny Hale said. It shows up in everything she does.

"She can be tremendously focused. She has always been very competitive, even as a freshman. She is tremendously determined."

McClellan's drive, focus and hard work earned her a chance to attend an elite rowing camp put on by the United States national team after the season. The camp was at the Olympic training center, and was a dream come true for an Olympic hopeful. Oddly enough, though, it was at the Olympic camp where McClellan realized Olympic gold was not her real goal.

"I really found myself there," she said.

She said she was at the camp when she realized that the women who make the Olympic team devote their entire lives to the sport, and that wasn't something she was ready to do.

When she returned to campus, she joined Navigators, a non-denominational Christian group at K-State. She was able to find God. She still worked hard every day in practice, but she said she no longer focused on the sport. Instead, she learned to focus on all of the people around her.

One of those people was Hale. Coach Hale has been with the women's crew team since its inception as a varsity sport in fall 1996. McClellan said she considers Coach Hale one of the best teachers she has ever had.

"My coach has taught me more, not just about rowing, but about God and everything else than anyone ever,"

McClellan said.

The respect is mutual between teacher and student in this situation. Hale explained how McClellan's vast experience and tough-as-nails competitive attitude has helped her through the years.

"She's just tough. There is no other way to describe it — she is just mentally and physically tough," Hale said. "She's co-captain on this year's team. Josie's a leader."

McClellan assumed her role as leader through hard work. When she was still in high school, McClellan had to call K-State to let them know she was interested in walking on to the rowing team. In a way, she recruited herself, she said.

She worked her way up the chain, and her hard work paid off. She has rowed with the varsity 8 boat for the last three years since she was a sophomore. She has gone from being the faceless freshman walk on, to being a leader on the team — a responsibility McClellan doesn't take lightly.

"I am on top now," she said. "I have gone from being the chaser, to being the chased, and I have to keep the bar moving up. When they catch me, I have to congratulate them, because they earned it. Then I have to go out and try and move the bar up again."

Flag football players go to Lincoln

BY ERIKA SAUERWEIN
Kansas State Collegian

K-State football is heading to Nebraska again this weekend.

But this time it's three women's flag football teams heading to Lincoln to participate in the 2001 Flag Football Regional Championship.

All-university flag football champions the Red Shirts, along with Alpha of Clovia and Superwomen, will compete against 15 teams from surrounding states for the regional title. The winner will receive an invitation to participate in the 23rd Annual Flag Football Championships in New Orleans, La., in December. The team also will receive $1,000 to help fund the trip.

"We are extremely excited and nervous," Red Shirt team captain Jeree Gentry said. "We want to go for the competition and to have fun. It is a new experience and just a chance to get out of Manhattan."

The two-time all-university champions haven't lost a game in two years. The team was invited to go to regionals last year, but declined. Gentry said there was overwhelming support to go to the tournament this year.

"A lot of parents wanted to go this year, and we just were more excited about it," Gentry said. "We don't really know what to expect, but we do know the competition is going to be tougher."

Alpha of Clovia already knows the competition will be tough to beat. The team competed in the tournament last year. Alpha of Clovia won its first two games, but then exited the tournament early Sunday with a loss to a team from Iowa.

"It was a lot of fun last year," team captain Brenda Kirkham said. "We didn't have a clue to what was going on. But now we have an idea, and it is a little less stress."

Kirkham said the team has been practicing three times a week and has been scrimmaging the men of the Smith Scholarship house.

"It really ups the intensity when we scrimmage the Smith house," she said. "It can be frustrating at times, but I think it will make us a lot quicker."

Superwomen, the third K-State team to make the tournament field, also was undefeated in regular season recreational play before losing in the semifinals.

Five of the Superwomen team members have been to the tournament twice before playing for Kappa Alpha Theta. Team captain Sara Meese said she would be disappointed if the team didn't reach the semifinals of the tournament.

"Both years we have been to the semi-

Cat netters shut out Bears

BY DAN SMITH

Coming into Wednesday night's battle with Baylor, head coach Suzie Fritz knew how much a win would mean to her team.

With an invitation to the postseason all but locked up, Fritz said her team still wanted more.

"We need 'em all," she said. "We want to win as many as we possibly can. As for our place in the tournament, I think we had a pretty good indication that we would be in the tournament, but we need to get as many as we can to try to secure either a seed — a host — or at least the opportunity to have a good first couple rounds."

The chances for that scenario might have slid a bit more into K-State's corner with the Cats' 3-0 win over the Bears last night.

With the win, K-State posted its first season sweep of the Bears since 1998. The win also strengthened the Cats' grip on third place in the Big 12 after Colorado fell to Texas in Austin, and gave the Cats their longest win streak of the season at five games.

"We talked at the beginning of this tough, five-game stretch that we wanted to really prepare one at a time and pick 'em off out one at a time, and I feel great about the way that we're playing and the win tonight, for sure, was a good win," Fritz said.

K-State got the win behind solid matches from Lauren Goehring and Lisa Mimick.

Goehring led the team with 14 kills on 619 hitting. Mimick finished with a team-high 15 digs and eight kills in her first match since being named the Big 12's Player of the Week.

K-State now turns its attention toward finishing the year on a high note heading into the postseason with big games against Texas A&M and Missouri.

"This win gives us a good energy going into the tournament," Goehring said. "We'll probably be on the road in the tournament, so this gives us a lot of confidence."

RINGS

Nicole Donnelly/Collegian

■ The silver will fly when prospective metalsmiths learn the tricks of the trade and take home an inexpensive handmade gift at the KSU Metalsmithing Society's annual holiday workshop this weekend.

BY JJ DUNCAN

Kansas State Collegian

Instead of using construction paper and glue sticks to put together a handmade gift for a loved one, try using sterling silver and a soldering iron.

The KSU Metalsmithing Society will have its annual Holiday Ring Workshop on Saturday. Stan Thornton, president of the Metalsmithing Society, said he has been helping with the workshop for three years, and it is open to anyone.

"Anyone can come in. There's nothing they need to bring," said Thornton, senior in metalsmithing, jewelry and art education. "It seems difficult at first, but it's easy to pick up."

Workshop attendees first sit down and go through the steps of designing the rings they want to make and then figure out their own ring sizes.

If someone is making the ring for someone else, that person needs to know the ring size when beforehand.

The entire process usually takes those new to it three to five hours to get through, and it gives them a better understanding of how the rings are made, said Eric Ryser, vice president of the Metalsmithing Society.

"It's nice to see someone's face when they've made a ring, and it's actually done, and they know it's something they did themselves," Ryser, junior in metalsmithing and jewelry, said.

Sterling silver is a good metal for novices to start on, because it is a precious metal, but it also is inexpensive so if there's a mistake, it isn't too expensive to replace the metal, said Darin Hagerman, secretary of the Metalsmithing Society.

Hagerman, sophomore in management information systems, said he has worked for more than eight years as a jeweler, which has given him insight into his craft.

Passing that insight along to other students is helpful, Hagerman said. Hagerman is a certified jeweler, and he will be instructing students on Saturday by demonstrating the process they will go through.

"If they need help I'm there to offer it to them, but it's still their project," he said. "I want to leave them with a feeling that they accomplished something."

Hagerman said no one should be scared to try the craft.

"There's no reason to be intimidated, because every one of the students in the program comes in at the same level, and they are still able to succeed," he said.

The workshop costs $20 and serves as a fundraiser for the Metalsmithing Society, which uses such events profits to help fund for group activities.

Other fundraisers include the repair days in the spring semester and the ring sale that will take place Dec. 4-6 in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

Another workshop is being planned near Valentine's Day, Thornton said.

Hagerman said he enjoys metal works, because they offer a third dimension to art, and they take a different level of creativity because they are sometimes meant to be used or worn in some way. After working with different types of metals, Hagerman said his favorite to work with is gold, because it is much more malleable than most metals.

Thornton said the rings work well as gifts, and he often gives different metal works as presents to friends and family.

Ryser said he would encourage anyone interested to try out the workshop.

"With the right teaching, anyone can do it," Ryser said. "People who would normally think they could never do something like this, it gives them a chance to accomplish something new. It's also a good gift idea because Christmas is right around the corner."

Ring workshop details

The Holiday Ring Workshop, sponsored by K-State University Metalsmithing, will be from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Saturday in Willard 318. The cost is $20, and no prior experience is necessary. To sign up call Stan Thornton, 532-1752.

K-State women's basketball opens regular season play on road; Wildcats to start 4 freshman for first time in program history

BY MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

When K-State takes the floor at Georgia Tech on Friday, one could expect to see a lack of confidence due to the Cats' overall inexperience.

K-State will start four freshmen and a sophomore, but experience will be the only thing they are short on — not confidence.

In the Cats' two preseason games, they won by a combined total of 68 points. Against the Yellow Jackets, though, a team receiving votes in the USA Today/ESPN Coaches Poll, the young Cats will need all the confidence they can get, something freshman forward Kendra Wecker understands.

"Our first game being away on the road, it's going to be a different atmosphere for us," she said. "We're going to have not too many people other than our team rooting for us, so that will be different. We're playing in another big gym."

Nonetheless, Wecker said she is excited rather than intimidated by the game.

"It's a tough way to start off the season, but it also presents a challenge for us to show what we have as a team bringing into the season," she said. "Hopefully, we can go down there and get a win and start making some noise."

"I'm excited and ready to get things going."

That excitement is echoed in all of the young players, head coach Deb Patterson said, who have demonstrated a strong desire to win so far in the early season.

"I think they're almost too competitive to be scared,"

Patterson said. "Now, they were very nervous before the first game. In fact, a couple of them said they could hardly breathe, they were so nervous, but to look at their faces, you would never know that."

"I really think they're bringing a fearless mentality to the floor, and they love the opportunity to play, and they're able to roll with the punches. We'll continue to test their ability to do that as we line up against some of these real high-caliber nonconference opponents."

While the Cats might be fearless, they must also show composure under pressure against the Yellow Jackets, who try to cause turnovers with intense defensive pressure.

"I know they'll extend their defense some. They'll trap us. They'll throw some different defensive looks at us, particularly knowing we're young, but also knowing that's how they play," Patterson said. "So we'll see a lot in a short period of time. We'll have to be composed and answer those challenges with more maturity than experience. We don't have the experience."

Despite the lack of experience, the Cats might handle defensive pressure better than Patterson's last several teams, which struggled with traps and full-court presses due to a lack of ball handling skills at the guard position. This season, though, that is no longer the case.

"We have individuals who are willing to handle and assume responsibility for the ball," Patterson said. "And we have good decision-makers, so I feel we will go in there and make good decisions against the pressure."

"We demonstrated it in practice, and now the ultimate test is on the road in someone else's gym in your first game ever in Division I. How will you respond? I'm as confident as I've ever been. I feel a lot better now."

Patterson also should feel good about her team's offensive scoring potential. In the two exhibition games, Wecker averaged 20.5 points per game. Freshmen Megan Mahoney and Laurie Koehn also averaged 16.5 points and 11 points, respectively. Last year's Big 12 Freshman of the Year, Nicole Ohlde, has averaged 14.5 points per game.

All that scoring was done using just a portion of K-State's total offensive package, though. Since those two games, the Cats have installed more sets and plays on both offense and defense, Wecker said.

"These last couple days of practice have been really good, just looking at some different offensive sets and getting some different zone defenses," she said. "We're ready to go."

finals and unfortunately not past that," Meese said. "But we want to get back there. The mentality of people change for the tournament. I think we will have the leadership to help the girls who haven't been to the tournament. It will be an important factor."

Unlike Alpha of Glovia, the Superwomen have just started practicing.

"We practiced minimal all season," Meese said. "We just go out to have fun and have a good time."

All three captains said the trip to New Orleans would be very rewarding.

"We have high expectations for the tournament," Gentry said. "What team doesn't?"

into completion without anybody really knowing. Selig didn't announce that the Twins were on the potential chopping block until recently. Even now, the Major League Baseball Web site doesn't mention contraction. Sure, it makes a big deal of the World Series, one of the most exciting in recent memory, and it pays homage to home-run hitting heroes like Barry Bonds and the recently retired Mark McGwire. But there is absolutely no mention of contraction.

Contraction is only mentioned on the Web sites of Montreal and Minnesota, along with desperate pleas by fans to save their teams.

Unfortunately for those fans, even if their teams don't get chopped, the mere possibility will kill any competitive chance the Expos or Twins have next season. No player wants to hang his hat in a locker that might not be there in six months.

In the end, Selig is only causing more damage than any possible good that could come from contraction, but Selig's vision for baseball is and always has been firmly locked on the bottom line.

He is a blight on baseball and should be cut from the sport forever.

FOOD SAFETY

Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., recently proposed a bill that calls for spending to boost security, implement a response strategy and fund grants to research diseases in the agriculture industry. It would allocate $1.1 billion next year and $271 million each year after that for the next 10 years.

The bill doesn't specify the locations of the facilities — only that they are built somewhere in the United States.

If that somewhere is K-State, the university could benefit from the prestige of having a facility with such rare capabilities. Researchers would have the opportunity to look for new and improved vaccines, treatments, ways to counter pathogens through preventative or defensive methods and more advanced diagnostics.

The research facilities would enhance the international reputation of the universities, enabling them to better recruit faculty and students. It also would attract economic development to the state and create jobs, he said.

"All three initiatives at all three campuses would be beneficial," he said.

Mostly, they would benefit people's safety, Jaax said.

While biological agents threaten the nation's food supply and animals, they also threaten the general population, Jaax said. In Kansas, there are 2.5 million head of cattle. Any kind of threat would be devastating to the economy and people of this state, he said.

Protecting people against the threat of bioterrorism will require much work, Adkins said.

"It's a long-term issue and a long-term problem that will require long-term planning," he said. "The problem is, we don't have that much time."

Even without the ongoing threat, Jaax said the facility is useful.

"We don't even have to look at bioterrorists," he said. "We should really have these kind of facilities. These are the kind of facilities that are useful even when we're not talking about bioterrorism."

Technologies, said the delay of funds is frustrating, but not necessarily shocking.

"I guess we can't be surprised," Johnson said. "You can only project what it might cost in the beginning. Things are more expensive and going up all the time."

Johnson said private donors gave $2.3 million for the cancer research also, which he said was his department's gift to the building.

The building will house the Department of Biochemistry, the Center for Basic Cancer Research and the Division of Biology. Presently, the cancer research offices are on Hayes Drive, which is close to Kmart and Wal-Mart, but the offices used to be on campus, Johnson said.

"It will be good to be back on campus where we belong," he said. "I drive back and forth, back and forth, like a yo-yo."

Steve White, associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, said having the three units in close proximity will be beneficial and should have a very positive effect on the research projects in K-State's biology area. White also said it's a little frustrating that biochemistry can't move in right away, but he and his associates handled the situation well.

"At this point, we know it's going to get done eventually, and we know that the two units will be moving in next year," he said. Johnson said he is excited for an educational room that the cancer research unit will have in the new building. He said now, when people come to learn about the cancer research at K-State, he has a hard time finding adequate space for all the observers.

Also, he said, a large courtyard on the north side of the building with a privacy wall and a waterfall will be beneficial to those who visit after losing loved ones to cancer. He said that although the teaching and research areas will be contemporary, the offices will be very traditional to add to the stable-looking environment for people.

Gatewood said he has no idea when funds will become available to finish the building, but he said when it is completed, it will be an extremely attractive addition to campus, blending a contemporary lab system and maintaining the traditional nature of campus.

"It's a building we're all going to be very proud of," he said.

Carter said the building will not look like the collegiate gothic structure that Hale Library has, but will coordinate with the existing Ackert structure. Whether the building will receive a new name, or be named in honor of a significant donor is yet to be decided, he said.

The funding of the building will come with private money and gifts in kind, or it could come with raising money over time, but it will come, he said.

"Anyway it goes, we will have Ackert finished," Carter said. "It's just how long it will take."

erasing a 5.9 percent drop in September.

At building and garden supply stores, sales rose by 2.8 percent in October, after falling by 2.6 percent. At health and beauty stores, sales went up 1.7 percent, after a 0.3 percent rise.

Sales of sporting goods, books and music rose by 3 percent in October, following a 2.2-percent decline. Sales of electronics and appliances rose 0.7 percent, after a 1.4 percent drop.

Bar and restaurant sales grew by 1.4 percent, a month after falling 2.5 percent.

Sales at furniture and home furnishing stores, however, declined 0.5 percent, after an even bigger 4.2-percent decrease. Sales at gasoline stations fell 6.4, reflecting lower prices at the pump, following a 2.8 percent increase.

The 7.1 percent increase in total retail sales in October was the largest since the government began keeping retail sales records under the current classification system in 1992.

Last week, the nation's biggest retailers reported generally disappointing sales. But discounters and other value-oriented stores continued to be the beneficiaries of consumers' frugality.

Kansas gets U.S. team to help fight terrorism

BY LIBBY QUAID
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Kansas is getting a specialized military team to respond to terrorist attacks, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld announced Thursday.

Five new Weapons of Mass Destruction Civil Support Teams are authorized in this year's Defense Department budget, to be set up in Kansas as well as Alabama, Michigan, Tennessee, and West Virginia.

"Here in Kansas, we can breathe a little easier knowing that a highly skilled team will be working to detect problems before they happen and respond quickly to any emergency," said Rep. Jim Ryan, R-Kan. Ryan serves on the House Armed Services Committee.

Each team has 22 full-time National Guard members under the direction of their governor. Their job is to identify danger, whether chemical, nuclear or biological, then advise local authorities on how to handle it, and prepare for any other military units on the way. Twenty-seven other states, including Missouri, already have the teams.

The Defense Department called Rep. Todd Tiahrt, R-Kan., Thursday morning to say his state would be getting a team. Recruitment and training for the new teams should begin within months, and the teams are expected to be certified in 2003.

Created in response to the 1993 World Trade Center bombing and 1995 Oklahoma City bombing, the teams have endured some criticism. In September, the General Accounting Office, the investigative arm of Congress, recommended a moratorium on adding more teams, saying they need to resolve problems that undermine their usefulness.

A Pentagon review of the teams said many had defective safety equipment and poor training. The review said preparedness is so bad that Guard members at one point were given mobile labs with air filters installed backward and gas masks with incompatible parts.

But, state officials who have been lobbying to get a team say the attacks Sept. 11 should erase any doubts that the teams are necessary.

"I think our ongoing education on terrorism is going to change the makeup of the team, and the training of the team, and the equipment they will use," said Tiahrt, a member of the defense spending panel of the House Appropriations Committee. "I think it's important that we start now and allow it to grow."

Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., and Maj. Gen. Greg Gardner, who heads the Kansas National Guard, pushed to locate a team in Kansas. Roberts said the move "recognizes the important role that Kansas guardsmen play in our security."

Gardner said the unit would be based at Forbes Field in Topeka, adding another layer of security to the state's defenses.

He added that the unit's central location in the Midwest also advantageous for rapid deployment.

Roberts said members of each unit train year-round, in all weather conditions.

AMERICA RESPONDS

Erin Green, junior in chemical engineering, takes the cap off a water bottle while participating in the Recycling Day activities on the K-State campus Thursday. Bottles must be emptied and have no caps on them to be accepted by a recycling center.

Uncap the bottle, dump the liquid and separate the plastic bottle from the plastic cap.

Although it's only a three step process, one student organization spent four hours working through it — over and over again.

In conjunction with America Recycles Day, Students for Environmental Action spent Thursday morning and afternoon uncapping plastic bottles and passing out petitions and recycling pledge cards.

Recycling round-up

■ The United States makes up less than five percent of the total population on Earth, yet we consume over 30 percent of all the resources.

■ On any Sunday, more than 500,000 trees are used to produce the 88 percent of newspapers that are never recycled.

■ Americans produce about 13 million tons of garbage every month.

■ In the year 2000, K-State transferred 3,505.5 tons to the Riley County Transfer Station.

■ K-State also recycled 328.8 tons of material.

■ On average, 60 percent of household waste is recyclable.

plastic bottles have to be uncapped because the crusher they use doesn't exert enough pressure to smash the bottles with caps on them.

She said there are machines available that can do the task, but the start-up cost for the machinery is high.

"Because it's so expensive, the university just uses student labor right now," Green said, "but it has to be done. If the caps don't come off, the bottles can't be recycled."

The bottles they uncapped were collected from the stadium after home football games.

SEA members handed out cards to passersby that allowed them to commit to recycling and buying recycled content products.

The latter, Sjogren said, was the most important.

"If there isn't a market for recycled content products, then recycling is fruitless," Sjogren said.

"Buying these products closes the loop in the recycling triangle."

She said the market for these products, such as recycled paper, is down right now. The pledge cards, she said, are a good way to get people thinking about buying the products.

"Some people think recycling all by itself is enough," Sjogren said. "but if we don't do anything with the recycled material, then we've missed an important part."

Another bonus to the pledge cards, she said, is if students return their cards to Keep Kansas Beautiful by Nov. 20, they will be entered into national and state drawings to win prizes.

SEA members also encouraged the campus community to sign a petition saying they think recycling is important and K-State should do their part to manage its waste — which means creating a permanent recycling budget for the University Recycling Program.

"K-State needs to create a budget so the recycling program can sustain itself," Sjogren said.

Current recycling, she said, is part of the Division of Facilities budget. Sjogren said that to do what needs to be done, more funds need to be available.

"When we get them filled with signatures, we're going to take the petitions to wherever we can get results. This is important," she said.

SEA member Erin Runnels, freshman in pre-veterinary medicine, said she didn't mind spending a few hours of her day uncapping trash bags full of bottles, because in the end, it would be worth it.

"The environment is important to everyone," she said.

"One aspect of keeping a good environment is recycling. Obviously, that makes recycling really important."

Wage group takes pride in effortsBY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Last week's Manhattan City Commission decision to allocate Mercy Health Center $1 million might have been a setback for the Flint Hills Living Wage Coalition, but it was not a complete loss.

John Exdell, coalition chair, said he hoped the commission would have tabled the bill and added stipulations that would have required the hospital to pay all of its employees at a living wage of at least $8.70 per hour.

Exdell said the coalition's rally preceding last week's commission meeting really helped to distribute the group's message.

"We didn't prevail on the part of the vote," Exdell said. "But we made headway in the validity of the view. We are still conscious of the fact that many Mercy employees are not paid well. We think we were able to get the view out clearly."

The coalition's goal for visiting the commissioners was twofold, he said.

"We wanted to win on the issue of better wages for Mercy employees and show the high need for a living wage policy for future applicants from any Economic Development Fund money."

Charles Hughes, executive director of the Mercy Community Health Foundation, said he questioned the coalition's underlying motives for fighting the bill.

"I didn't know what they were trying to do, to be honest," Hughes said. "They were trying to meet their agenda by holding a project hostage, by slowing it down. A more reasonable way would be to request that the commission pass a separate bill supported by the community instead of slowing down a particular project."

Regents bill would change credit hoursBY DANA STRONGIN
Kansas State Collegian

K-State students might have to add another semester to their expected graduation dates.

The Kansas Board of Regents approved a proposal to increase the number of junior- and senior-level classes required for a bachelor's degree in its meeting Wednesday.

Kansas students now need 40 upper-division credit hours to graduate, but under the new requirements they will need 54 hours. The policy, which was approved by a unanimous decision, will not take effect until fall of 2003.

K-State administrators will be meeting to discuss the potential effects of the requirement increase on the university, said Kyle Barker, student body president.

"This decision definitely affects transfer students from community colleges," he said.

The policy also might make it necessary for K-State to alter its class structure or hire new faculty members, Barker said.

"Anytime the requirements increase, it also makes us look at the way classes are structured," he said. "We may have to offer more upper division courses to fulfill student needs."

One concern with the policy is the lack of resources available at K-State, Barker said.

"We may have to make upper-division classes more available," he said. "This is not that easy to do. We are already struggling with space."

Barker and other student body presidents met to discuss their opinion of the potential impact this change could create, Barker said.

"The regents generally involve students in decisions," he said. "We want them to understand the impact of this and how it will affect students."

Police officials arrest 3 in convenience store robbery

Three men were arrested and one taken into custody at a juvenile detention facility Wednesday evening in connection with a robbery of Dara's Fast Lane, 1132 Pillsbury Dr.

Willis Parrish, Christopher Wood and Andre Channel all were arrested for aggravated robbery and conspiracy to commit aggravated robbery. Channel also was arrested on two outstanding warrants for failure to appear. Bond for Parrish was set at $25,000, while bond for Wood and Channel was set at $100,000. A fourth man, Craig Toombs, was charged with aggravated robbery and conspiracy to commit aggravated robbery, and because he was a minor, was transported to the Juvenile Detention Facility in Junction City.

Witnesses said they saw two black males and one white male enter the store at 8:10 Tuesday evening and rob the on-duty cashier at gunpoint, according to a press release issued by the Riley County Police Department. The men wore T-shirts pulled over their eyes with holes cut in the shirts for their eyes. The men left the scene in a cream-colored vehicle and were apprehended by the RCPD soon after.

K-State-Salina community helps family overcome fire

Volunteers have stepped up to donate time and materials after a fire destroyed a K-State-Salina student's apartment Oct. 18.

The afternoon fire left Jordan Wagner, freshman in computer science technology, and his family without a place to live.

Help from the community and student body has been overwhelming, Wagner said.

"I have had help from the United Way, Red Cross, our church and from my family," he said.

K-State Salina's Student Government Association coordinated a clothing and essential item drive that will be ongoing until Tuesday.

Boxes are located in the College Center, the Aero Center, the Student Activity Center and the Technology Center.

"To be honest, I wasn't very optimistic about the human race, but now I feel differently," Wagner said. "Everybody has been so wonderful, and now the only thing I need at this point is time."

The cause of the fire still is unknown. Repairs on the apartment should be completed in about three months, Wagner said.

leaders of Osama bin Laden's terrorist network with more focused airstrikes, more timely intelligence and a more active hunt by U.S. special operations troops in southern Afghanistan, senior Pentagon officials said Thursday.

"We are tightening the noose," said Army Gen. Tommy Franks, commander of the U.S. forces in the region.

Franks, encouraged by the sudden retreat of the Taliban militia from northern Afghanistan this week, met with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon on Thursday to spell out his evolving plan for completing the destruction of bin Laden's al-Qaeda network and its Taliban supporters.

On Friday, Franks will present the plan to President Bush, Rumsfeld said.

New unemployment claims drop for 3rd straight week

WASHINGTON, D.C. — New claims for state unemployment benefits fell for the third straight week, but the number of laid-off Americans collecting benefits still reached an 18-year high.

The Labor Department reported Thursday for the week ending Nov. 11, new jobless claims fell by a seasonally adjusted 8,000 to 444,000.

Even though new claims declined for the third straight week, the level of claims remained high enough to suggest the labor market continues to be weak.

The number of laid-off workers continuing to receive unemployment benefits climbed to 3.83 million for the week ending Nov. 3, indicating jobless workers are having a difficult time finding employment. That was the highest level since Feb. 12, 1983.

ASK THE FINANCIAL PLANNERS

Dear Financial Planners,

I want to save up for a big purchase that I plan to make five years after graduation. Would it be better to put my savings into a stock mutual fund account or a money market account?

Dear Student,

Before making your decision about which investment approach is best, you need to know a bit about the differences between these investments.

A stock mutual fund is an investment that uses professional money managers to buy and sell stocks for you. If the professional manager makes money, so do you, but if the manager loses money, you do, too. Usually stock mutual funds carry a high degree of risk. Money market accounts, on the other hand, are relatively low-risk investments. You can buy money market accounts at a local bank or through a brokerage firm.

Our general rule is: The less risk offered by an investment, the less return provided. So, you first need to determine your expectations about your investments. A money market account will allow you easier access to your money in case of an emergency. However, if you have other funds set aside for this purpose, it should not be a heavily weighted determinant.

Students go the distance

BY KECIA N. SEYB
Kansas State Collegian

Sometimes Scott Boswell spends $700 a month on phone bills to keep his relationship with his girlfriend — who lives 2,200 miles away — going strong.

Boswell, senior in biology, is one college student among several who is involved in a long-distance relationship, experts say. A long-distance relationship is any relationship between a committed couple in which both parties live far enough away that they cannot see each other on a given day if they need to.

Boswell met his girlfriend last summer in Mexico when he was studying abroad, and the two have been dating for about three months. Before he left Mexico, Boswell said he and his girlfriend — Anamari Garcia, who will graduate from ITESM in Queretaro, Mexico, in December — weighed the options of their relationship and if they could survive the long distance relationship.

"We sat down and had a pretty serious conversation about how we really felt about each other and if we wanted to do it. And I'm glad that we did because I honestly feel, I mean, I love this girl," he said.

The couple talks every afternoon and every night either through the Internet or on the telephone, so he said his phone bills average about $300 or $400. Boswell said although he ultimately sees himself with Garcia, sometimes the distance makes it hard.

"There's times we go through a lot of pain together. Everyone else gets to spend time with their boyfriend and girlfriend, and we don't get to have that quality time. But you have to look at it that's just going to make those times when we are together even more special."

"When something means that much to you, and you don't get to live it, it's like there's an emptiness inside of you sometimes. Although in the long-term I feel this is the woman for me, and in the long term I'll be happy. In the short term, it hurts me sometimes. It doesn't hurt me to love her, but not to be with her does."

Briana Nelson, assistant professor in the College of Family Studies and Human Services in the Marriage and Family Therapy Program, said the most important thing in a long-distance relationship, as in any relationship, is communication. Many people in long-distance relationships do struggle with making quality time to spend with each other. She said it often takes a lot more work.

"You don't have the ease you would have if you lived in the same community," she said. "You have to be more creative."

Wendy Teater, senior in elementary education, has been with her fiancé, who lives in Kansas City, Kan., for about three years.

She said her long-distance relationship also is filled with frustration and too little time together.

"It's really hard. Every time we fight, I know it's probably because we're having a long-distance relationship," she said. "It's very obvious that it's very easy to become distant when you don't see each other every day and don't know what's going on in their lives."

"It's hard to catch that up all in one phone call."

Nelson said couples need to use both their times apart and together wisely.

"Try to enjoy and use the time apart. Don't use the time to just sit around and mope," she said. "When couples are apart, they have these really high expectations for when they see each other. Then if they fight or something goes wrong, the time is kind of ruined. They go into the time together almost overly overstressed."

Some couples also struggle with the lack of physical communication, she said, but this usually depends on their individual values. She said it is important that the couple stay monogamous. Boswell said he misses seeing Garcia physically.

"Not the boomchickaboomboom," Boswell said, "just holding her hand and hugging her and stuff like that."

Nelson said to remember that some aspects in a relationship, such as arguing, are better done face to face. If there is a big issue or conflict, she said a lot of nonverbal communication can't be done over the phone.

Until Garcia moves to the United States, she and Boswell will continue to work through the trials of a long-distance relationship, Boswell said. But he said that's OK because it's worth having a long-distance relationship with her.

"The most important thing is the two people and not the distance between them," he said.

Tips for making a long-distance relationship work

■ Don't talk every day. Let some time go by so you actually look forward to hearing each other's voices or seeing the other's words on your screen.

■ As much as possible, share the costs of being apart. Money matters can be a huge burden to young men who feel the pressure to keep the relationship together and pay for everything.

■ Be careful how much you open your heart and feelings and time to those people closer to you (in proximity, not feelings). If you allow someone access to your heart, they just might take a nice long walk through your emotions, and your long-distance partner will notice a change in you.

■ Don't see each other every weekend. Let some time go by so, again, you look forward to seeing each other.

■ When you do reunite, don't let it all be about the physical. Feed the rest of the relationship that needs nourishment as well.

■ Get out and enjoy the college experience so you don't feel cheated. Enjoy the school you have chosen to attend. Revel in your friendships. Learn who you are.

■ Never argue over e-mail, and try not to argue over the phone, either. It is best to have intense discussions in person the next time you see each other so nothing is misinterpreted.

■ Don't surprise visit each other. People are creatures of habit and don't like their patterns messed with. Plus, what if you don't have time to spend with them when they visit because of commitments? It will seem as if you don't care and that might be the farthest thing from the truth.

AMERICA - KSU - RECYCLES

A few weeks ago K-State recycling program personnel were contacted by Rebecca Gould, Interim Director of ITAC, about the possibility of promoting computer recycling in conjunction with America Recycles Day, November 15, 2001. A cooperative effort was forged between Facilities, ITAC, Health & Environmental Safety, and the Controller's Office which will result in over 500 pieces of computer equipment being recycled by the end of the week. Facilities would like to thank all those who helped, especially the ITAC personnel who called all the campus departments and helped pick up the equipment. Facilities recycling will continue to pick up computer equipment, (with a completed DA-110 form), newspaper, mixed office paper, plastic bottles, aluminum, cardboard, magazines, phone books, etc. If you have a question about whether something is recyclable, call us at 2-6446 and we'll come see if it is. And finally, a big thanks to the campus community for making this computer recycling effort a big success.

Regents increase in '03 graduation requirements lacks input

The Kansas Board of Regents' approval of an increase in the number of upper-level requirements was made without consideration to the university or its students. The Regents approved a proposal to increase the number of junior and senior level classes required for a bachelor's degree at its meeting Wednesday. Students now need 40 upper-division credit hours to graduate, but under the approved proposal, they would need 54 hours starting fall 2003.

Not only was this approved without properly informing students, the Regents also have not considered the full effect of the new requirements.

For K-State to meet these requirements, Kyle Barker, student body president, said the university will have to provide more upper-division courses, which will require more instructors.

With already tight budgets, this request is unreasonable to the university.

The approval requires more courses, more professors and delayed graduation. There are no benefits from the new requirements. The Regents need to reconsider how this will effect students and K-State.

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

I can't go dancing this weekend. I hurt my foot. Someone replace me please.

The only Kansas team that does good every year is KU basketball. Figure it out.

Does it make me soft that I watch Lifetime with my girlfriend?

Chicks don't dig mullets. Chicks dig guys with cool cars.

Your mom did a good thing by shaving off your mullet. They are ugly and old-fashioned.

Tuition is really going up. Do you all really think that is fair? Think about it: school or party.

Yes, I finally made out this weekend. The dry spell is over.

Has anyone else noticed the overabundance of short, shady men on campus?

A word of advice to the comment about no good-looking women in engineering: we are out there, but we are staying away from the dorky computer boys, so feel free to go ahead and change majors.

I would like to congratulate the men of ATO for taking up a half page of the Collegian to congratulate themselves.

Why seven pizzas?

To all those ladies looking for that perfect guy: all you have to do is call me.

I am a hot girl looking for a hot guy without a ghetto butt and a nice truck.

I saw the Nebraska guy twirler at the game. He must pick up on chicks.

I've got the slowest computer in the city.

Attention, all library attendees: beware of an older gentleman who likes to come up to your library table and quietly sneaks away with your newspaper when you are not finished reading it.

Hi, I am a girl in engineering, and the girl-to-guy ratio is one of the biggest reasons why I picked my major. So let's get together, and I will show you what good-looking is all about.

I love the Fourum.

Parking Services is the devil.

How can you guys continue to print Monkey Boy? Every time I even glance at it I get dumber.

Has anybody else seen that kid on campus that looks like a pear?

I just wanted to say the reason why Animal Science College grad students drink excessive amounts is because of ASI 860, 861, 862. Believe me, That is a proven study.

Why is it that the only thing keeping me going from day to day is the fact that there is going to be another Episode II preview in front of Harry Potter. That Episode II comes out in 182 days. Still trying to figure that out.

Professors, let's pull our heads out and stop scheduling tests during good TV hours.

I just want everyone to know Wednesday morning at approximately 8:15 outside of Blumont Hall I was attacked by a squirrel. This is no joke. There were witnesses, and my tennis shoe was mildly injured.

To the girl that drives the Toyota 4Runner and the, "treat me like the princess I am," on the back — can we go out?

To the guys who honked at us last night when we were walking to the R parking lot, thanks.

Hey, I heard a rumor that MacIntoshes really were computers. I was just wondering, is that true?

Mr. B strikes again.

I'd just like to say I get tired of reading of everyone's comments that begin with, "I'd just like to say," and end with thank you. Thank you.

Spammed

Companies access students via e-mail

The cost of an education at K-State may increase to benefit an out-of-state company. How? The process begins when students are duped by an aggressive company. The business attempts to gobble up student funds usually spent at campus establishments with clever marketing. The predatory business must be stopped.

Students who fall for the schemes divert their funds from campus establishments that are funded by student fees and generated revenue. When revenue drops for these campus establishments, student fees must increase to cover the difference.

How is an aggressive company able to market to K-State students? Technology has given easier access to student information than ever before.

Information available from K-State's Student Information Server (SIS) is a blessing and a curse. In blessing, it allows quick and easy retrieval of a friend or classmate's phone number and address.

However, the SIS can fall prey to misuse. Using information gleaned from SIS, a company can begin to barrage students with spam.

According to K-State Computing and Network Services www.ksu.edu/cns/nospam.html, spam is "Unsolicited commercial e-mail (UCE) or unsolicited bulk e-mail (UBE) sent to large numbers of recipients over the Internet."

More spam arrives each semester, with better hidden motives of how to exploit students financially.

The latest e-mail hit selected K-State accounts around 12:51 a.m. Nov. 14. I was one of the not-so-privileged students to receive the junk mailing from Pick-A-Prof.com.

Pick-A-Prof.com champions the service as, "The ultimate academic resource for selecting classes and buying textbooks."

With a quick survey in the computer lab, I found a few other students who received it. Though my statistical gathering ability is no Gallup poll, I found that about 5 percent of students received the e-mail. Chris and John (the guys@pick-a-prof.com who sent the e-mail) must have pulled about 1,000 names from the SIS and spammed them with the message.

Zac Cook

The subject line blared, "Find out what your professors don't want you to know!!!"

Red flag number one. The line raised my skepticism. If there really was something my professors didn't want me to know, would two Internet bozos have that information? I don't think so. But I opened the e-mail, trying to figure out how the spammers' hidden motive.

The e-mail opened saluting me as "Zachary."

Red flag number two. I go by "Zac." There are only three groups of people who would address me as "Zachary." My parents when they have reason to be angry with me, a few poetic friends who like to call me "Zachary Daquiri," and these two annoying spammers named "Chris and John."

The e-mail went on to promise "grading histories taken directly from Kansas State Records so that you can find the professors you have the best chance of getting an 'A' with." The e-mail also made sure I knew the site was "free" and encouraged me to forward the message to all of my friends.

I didn't want to waste my friends' time.

In reality, the service remains free as long as you browse the offerings of information. Then, the hidden motive begins to work.

The site hopes to draw you with the promise of the easiest schedule possible. Then the site suggests you support their service by purchasing your books at Pick-A-Prof.com. The site promises convenience, low prices and free delivery. The deal sounds too good to be true, and it is.

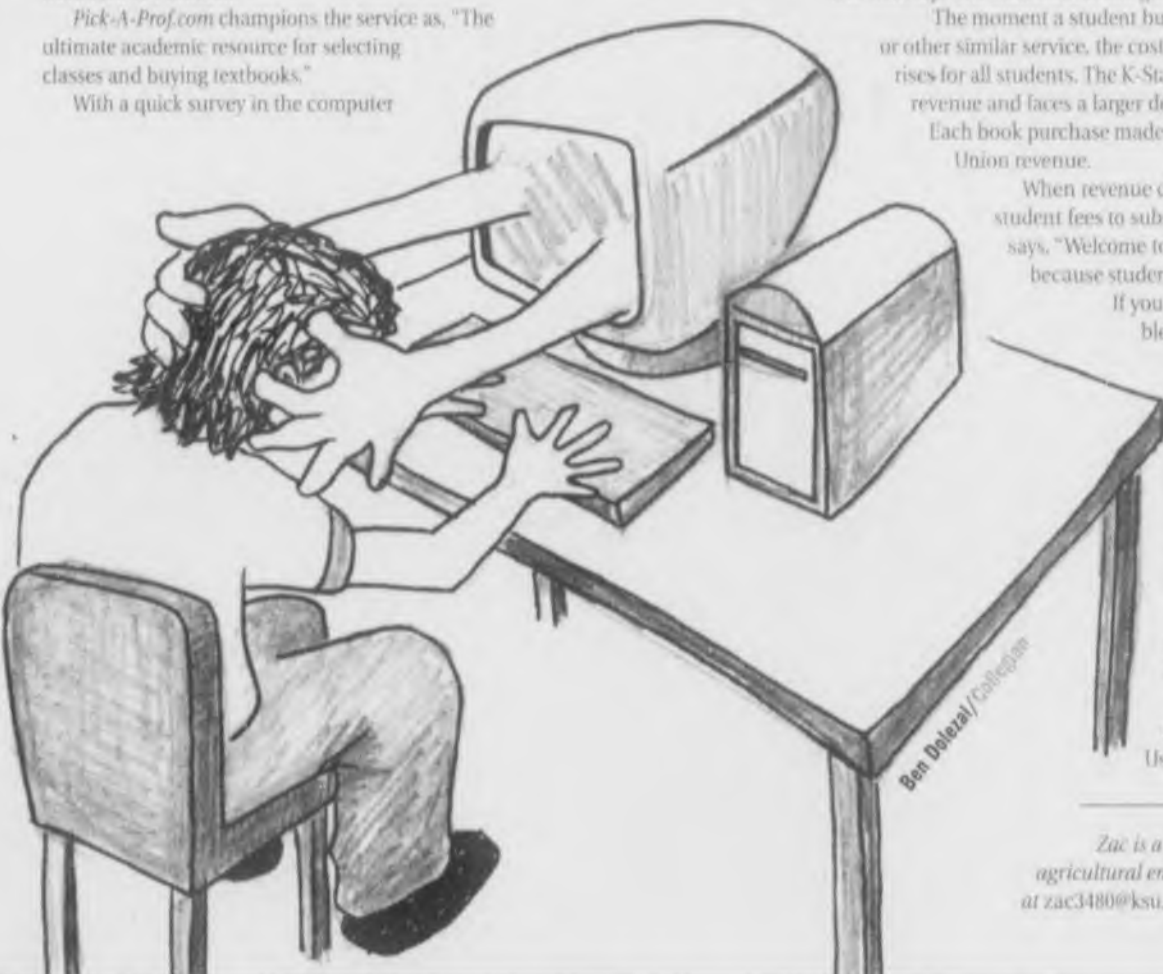

The moment a student buys books from Pick-A-Prof.com or other similar service, the cost of an education at K-State rises for all students. The K-State Union Bookstore loses revenue and faces a larger deficit because of such actions. Each book purchase made outside the bookstore lowers Union revenue.

When revenue drops, the Union must turn to student fees to subsidize the budget. The sign says, "Welcome to your K-State Student Union" because student privilege fees fund it.

If you are a real Wildcat and you bleed purple, you'll avoid Pick-A-Prof.com. There is no better reason than the one stated at the Pick-A-Prof.com Web site.

"This site is neither endorsed by nor an official Web site of Kansas State University. Not even a little bit," the Web site states. Only those who wish to increase the cost of education for everyone would use this site. Therefore, you should use this site, not even a little bit. Use it not at all.

MTV's news coverage essential for generation

Politics don't really excite me.

Sometimes I feel like I'm in the dark when it comes to news events. I'm not the type of person who camps out in front of the television watching CNN for the latest updates. More often than not, world news puts me to sleep.

The things that matter to me the most are the ones that affect my life. I know this is bad. I know I should try to keep up to speed with political events at every level, but it's hard.

I can only take so much CNN or Headline News before the yawns begin and my eyelids begin to droop.

When I was younger, Scooby Doo was more entertaining to me than the nightly news. From a young age, I got into the habit of reading fiction books and watching TV shows that were more entertaining than educational.

I think part of my disinterest in world affairs comes from the environment my generation has been raised in. We were raised in a world of remote controls, VCRs and the Internet. We've always had easy access to any type of entertainment we wanted, whenever we wanted.

If I do take time to get caught up on world events, I usually read quick briefs on the Internet or in the newspaper. Very rarely do I take time out of my busy schedule to plow through a lengthy article on the Taliban.

I was caught off-guard the other day when I saw a snippet of something with global relevance on MTV. It was one of the segments of MTV's "Fight For Your Rights" campaign.

MTV is not a station I tune into to catch up on global news. But sandwiched between the spanking new music videos and "Dismissed" was a little nugget of useful information.

You might have seen the segments I'm talking about. They're usually no longer than a minute, but they offer a summary or brief background about a political group in the Middle East or awareness about Muslim practices. But the spots are not limited to Middle Eastern awareness.

These features have catchy graphics and visual images designed to catch the attention of a generation weaned on MTV style. Unlike the news networks, the language is easy to understand and free of annoying and boring political commentaries.

According to the MTV Web site, the "Fight For Your Rights" campaign is incorporated into every part of MTV through public service announcements, news segments, programming events and the official Web site.

Finally, it seems like someone has caught onto how to reach audiences who balk at hardcore news programs. Although the MTV news briefs are not as in-depth as an article found in Time or a program on "Sixty Minutes," they are still achieving the same purpose of informing the public.

The media has received a lot of criticism for its coverage of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. I agree that some networks have done a better job of covering the crisis than others. MTV is one of the networks whose response should be commended.

MTV's duty is not to educate the public about the events surrounding the Sept. 11 attacks. However, they have risen to the challenge and filled a void.

The network's attempt to educate the public through news features and shared responses regarding the attacks went beyond the bounds of regular programming.

Like it or not, there are a lot of people like myself who don't stay up-to-date on current world situations. It's a fact of our society. It's also the job of the media to find ways to reach these people.

If the media neglects to find a way to reach the younger audiences who are becoming increasingly disenfranchised with the traditional news media, they will slowly die out.

Cats for Cans collects items

BY MICHAEL WATSON
Kansas State Collegian

One can of food donated at the Louisiana Tech game this Saturday can make a huge difference to a hungry family during the holidays.

Flint Hills Breadbasket and the K-State Cats for Cans are collecting food and funds two hours before the game to support the Mayor's Holiday Food and Fund Drive. The food will be used for local holiday food baskets.

"As long as people can have a festive meal, we would love to have it," said Shirley Bramhall, executive director of Flint Hills Breadbasket.

"Thanksgiving baskets are solely dependent on Cats for Cans. Without that, the baskets wouldn't be possible."

Collection barrels will be easy to find at the gates. There also will be volunteers pushing shopping carts and driving utility cars through the aisles to collect donations so people don't have to carry food up to the gates.

"What we would like to do is collect enough to do Thanksgiving and Christmas baskets," Bramhall said. "Anything else is above and beyond."

Bramhall said she is happy with the university's involvement with this project. Before 1994, Cats for Cans did not exist. Bramhall said there were holiday baskets, but this program helps tremendously.

There are many different organizations on campus that help collect donations.

"Fraternal and sororities volunteer a lot," she said. "They do a lot during homecoming, and they also do a lot outside of homecoming. Groups at the university do much more, and it's not just during homecoming. The impact we see from the university is huge."

The Business Ambassadors is one group on campus that helped with the Cats for Cans project.

Business Ambassadors placed cardboard boxes at four traffic areas in Calvin Hall. The group also broke into teams to collect food in different neighborhoods.

"Our goal was 500 pounds, and I know we exceeded that big time," said Chris Jackson, Cats for Cans committee leader.

"We had a scavenger hunt to see who could collect the most funds," he said. "The winning team got a free dinner."

Committee members also went out on Halloween to trick-or-treat for food donations. There were five people on the committee that went trick or treating. Jackson said that probably accounted for 250 pounds of their goal.

"Kids are already out for candy," he said. "Why not give us cans?"

Betsy Love, Cats for Cans committee member, said it is something Business Ambassadors wanted to do for the community.

"I was impressed with the participation," she said. "We had 20 ambassadors that wanted to do it. Not because they had to, but because they wanted to do it for the community."

LIVING WAGE

The $1 million will help to fund Mercy's expansion, which will provide more jobs and bring economic development to Manhattan, he said. By allocating the hospital the money, he said, the commissioners made a statement to the community.

"It's a statement that they want strong health care in their community," he said. "If the hospital had agreed to what the coalition had said, it would have had to cut a good portion from the expansion project from the increased labor costs."

"It was a judgment call."

He said the commissioners made the right decision.

Mayor Bruce Snead said he empathized with the coalition, but he did not think denying Mercy the money was the right decision.

"I understand their concern," Snead said. "I share a need for the jobs created to have as high a wage as possible."

"The essence of the statement was to support the expansion with the hospital as a key aspect of our infrastructure. We are supporting an existing employer."

In the future, he said he would be open to wages being an elevated criteria when reviewing new businesses in Manhattan.

"It is important that whoever we look at has a clear understanding of the wage needs of the people," he said.

Exdell said the coalition will continue to lobby for living wages in Manhattan. So far, members have collected more than 400 community member signatures on a petition asking the Commission to require all funds from the economic development fund to only go to businesses that pay their employees living wages, he said.

The Mercy allocation spent the last of the $10 million fund. He said the public would support another half-percent sales tax to replenish the fund and attract more businesses to Manhattan.

"The fund is out of money, but the issue is not dead," he said.

"There needs to be a living wage policy in place. The public will definitely endorse a new sales tax because people want assurance that their investments will produce living wage jobs, not jobs that pay $7 an hour."

Manhattan Habitat for Humanity has several projects underway in order to generate and increase funds.

Habitat, which builds homes for families in need, relies solely on donations. Each year, the program builds two houses at no cost to the future homeowner. But to do this, they need money.

Elise Lambert, executive director, said finding the funds is a constant battle.

"We've got dozens of projects going," said Dave Redmon, member of Habitat's Development Committee. "It takes a little here and a little there. This doesn't just happen."

Two of those projects are just starting. The first is a recycling program, and the second involves the Wonder Workshop Children's Museum.

Under the recycling program, Habitat will receive money from aluminum cans brought to recycling centers. Lambert said when the cans are dropped off, they will receive the money for them if the recycler mentions it is for Habitat.

"So, it's basically no money out of your pocket, and you're helping the environment," she said.

She said they first are targeting students because they consume a lot of canned beverages. She said they are starting by working with the K-State Greek system.

"We're trying to get a real strong basis," Lambert said. "Our ultimate goal is to eventually make it campuswide."

The other program involves the children at Wonder Workshop. The children will construct small houses that will act as collection banks. The children will get to choose how to decorate the houses, then they will be placed around Manhattan in various businesses.

Julia Harbers, junior in social work, was one of three that collaborated on the idea. She said they chose to work with children because of their attitude.

"They bring a new perspective to any project," she said. "They just enjoy what they are doing. They don't get caught up in perfection."

Senate debates fall break resolution, Friday stop dates

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Fulfilling a campaign promise, Student Body President Kyle Barker positively debated for a resolution at Thursday's Student Senate meeting that would change future fall breaks from a Friday to a Monday and Tuesday holiday. Senators unanimously passed the resolution.

The resolution also mandated a stop date on the Friday before fall and spring final exam weeks.

No professor could teach classes on a stop date, according to the legislation.

"The majority of students do need extra time before finals week," Barker said. "The stress during that time needs to be addressed, and it can be through this bill."

The first stop dates would occur Dec. 12, 2003, and May 9, 2004.

Through his discussions with faculty members, he said the Friday before finals week was not being utilized effectively.

Not having classes that day would not have a significant negative effect on students or professors, he said.

"This is just one step in how we are restructuring the week before final exams," he said.

The first updated fall break that would fall on a Monday and Tuesday would be Oct. 13 and 14, 2003.

"It just makes sense if we are going to have a spring break, we should have a fall break," he said.

Some senators asked why the first updated fall break and stop dates would not occur for another two years.

Barker said the University Calendar Committee needs the extra time because it plans out the university schedule years in advance.

Senators also unanimously passed a resolution recognizing Nov. 15 as America Recycles Day.

According to the resolution, participating in the day is a way students can help raise awareness about the need to reduce waste and help with environmental protection of Kansas air, land and water.

In other action Matt Wolters, senate chair, swore Janice Casten in as a new senator in the College of Education.

INTIMATE MUSIC

Arianna String Quartet to perform at All Faiths Chapel

BY BECKY FISCHER
Kansas State Columnist

The Arianna String Quartet will be well-prepared for its concert tonight at All Faiths Chapel.

"We devote five to six hours a day, six days a week, to rehearsal," said Rebecca Rhee, violinist and founding member of the group. "We need that much time to peel the layers off the music. Actually, there's never enough rehearsal time. We just have to put a lid on it and take it on stage."

Rhee and cellist Kurt Baldwin, both just out of college, formed the quartet nine years ago.

"It's almost every string player's dream to play in a quartet," Rhee said. "They're fun. Music for them comes from the most personal type of composing. It's an intimate experience for performer and listener."

Quartets also allow musicians to really be heard, Rhee said.

"There's four people, not 90 like in an orchestra," she said. "Every note is naked, exposed. It's an opportunity for more personal control and freedom."

While many musicians would like to play in a quartet, Rhee said few get the opportunity to do so for very long.

"We feel very lucky to be doing this," she said. "A lot of quartets can't survive, whether they're talented or not. There's some luck involved."

Part of that luck, Rhee said, was being named faculty artist teachers and quartet-in-residence for the University of Missouri at St. Louis. The group, consisting of Rhee, Kurt Baldwin, violinist Sheila Browne and violinist John McGrosso, teaches a variety of classes at the university.

McGrosso said it is important to teach aspects of music to students of all majors.

"Take physics, for example, which is a class we teach," McGrosso said. "Musicians have to be conscious of gravity, tension and release. Music works scientifically, but it's also important to understand how it works expressively."

The ability to express himself was why McGrosso said he joined The Arianna String Quartet.

"I was a part of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra for seven years," he said. "I got frustrated with rehearsing music three or four times, playing it once, and dropping it. With the quartet, I have a better chance to be more involved with the music. I'm able to continue working with the music we perform."

McGrosso has been performing with the group for three years.

"The challenges of being in a quartet are fantastically great," he said. "And I mean both definitions of great, huge and wonderful. It's a challenge to balance what we give to the music with revelation of the composer's intent, but when it finally comes together, it's incredible."

The unifying quality of the group is its respect for music and composers, McGrosso said.

"We've all had excellent teachers who've instilled in us respect," he said. "That's what brings the four of us together. And, we're all striving to portray this music as honestly as we can."

That takes hard work, Rhee said.

"It's difficult to put all your eggs in one basket," Rhee said, "but it's important for us to be committed. Like anything, dedication and hard work pay off."

Besides being dedicated, the group also shares a strong passion for what they do, Rhee said.

"We've all been playing since we were young," she said. "When you're a kid, there's a lot of distractions in your life. Really loving music probably kept us with it."

Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer of McCain Auditorium, said the group's talent is apparent.

"I've listened to their music, and it's quite exceptional," Jackson said. "You can tell they work really hard, because when just one person is off in a quartet, the whole thing sounds foul. They've got the music down."

The show, though scheduled at All Faiths Chapel, is part of the McCain Concert Series, Jackson said.

"The more intimate setting will work with the more intimate music," he said.

Intimate is how McGrosso describes the group. He said it's easy to spend so much time together when they respect each other so much.

"We're all walking in the footsteps of our great inspirations—our great teachers," McGrosso said. "We stumble a lot, but we help each other up to take a few more staggering steps."

Sanskriti event to showcase Indian culture

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Columnist

The sounds, tastes and fashion of the Indian culture will come to K-State when the Indian Students Association presents "Sanskriti" this weekend.

Sanskriti, which is Indian for "culture," takes place Sunday and is intended to showcase the culture of India, said Anup Aravind, graduate student in industrial engineering.

"It's a cultural show and will show what we are about," Aravind said.

The day will begin at 2:30 p.m. in the K-State Student Union Forum Hall, where Indian students will put on a talent show. The show, which will include dancing, singing and musicians, will give attendees a glimpse of the entertainment of the culture. The show is free to the public.

"A lot of our students have different talents," said Prasad Kaitay, graduate student in industrial engineering. "The culture is really diversified."

The program, which will last until 5:30 p.m., will also include displays of Indian clothing and its other fashions, Kaitay said.

At 5:30 p.m., event participants will move on to the Marianna Kistler Beach

Museum of Art, where ISA will offer a dinner of authentic Indian cuisine.

To end the day, Indian musician Raja will perform in a concert of classical Indian music in All Faiths Chapel. ISA worked with the Office of Student Activities and Services to bring Raja to campus, said Himanshu Kumbhokar, graduate student in industrial engineering.

Kaitay said he is looking forward to the event and cannot pinpoint a specific aspect of it that he particularly enjoys.

"It's hard to pick — the cultural show and the concert are something I'm really going to enjoy," he said.

Kaitay said Sanskriti was supposed to take place much earlier in the semester, but was postponed due to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. He said that since then, many more people have expressed interest in Sanskriti.

"There's been a lot more interest in this after those events," he said.

He said he knows the hostilities many people might have toward international students, and he hopes Sanskriti will enlighten some people about the Indian people.

"If we are able to preach peace, that would help," Kaitay said. "Our culture believes in peace."

Kaitay said he encourages anyone to attend the event who wants to get a taste of a different culture.

"Anybody can come and enjoy it," he said.

Bush administration supports proposed bill to fight bioterrorism

BY LAURA MECKLER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A plan to spend more than $3 billion to combat bioterrorism was proposed in the Senate on Thursday amid cries that the nation is woefully unprepared for such an attack. The Bush administration supported the concept, but balked at the cost.

Health and Human Services Secretary Tommy Thompson was set to begin spending the money. He said he hoped negotiations to buy some 250 million doses of smallpox vaccine would be finished by next week.

In Boca Raton, Fla., where the anthrax attack first hit, testing found anthrax in more than 30 spots inside the American Media building. Health officials suggested there must have been more than one tainted letter sent to the tabloid publisher, although none has been found.

Six weeks after the anthrax-by-mail attack began, interest in bioterrorism preparation was intense on Capitol Hill. Members of the House Commerce Committee were working on their own bioterror package. It was unclear whether Democrats would join Republicans in sponsoring the bill, but there was widespread agreement on the problem. Virtually every member of the panel wanted more attention and more money devoted to the problem. Many cited the crumbling facilities at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention and the lack of training on the local level.

"We all agree," said Rep. Diane DeGette, D-Colo., "we have ignored and underfunded public health in this country for more than 25 years."

Across the Capitol, Sens. Bill

Frist, R-Tenn., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., unveiled a $3.2 billion bioterrorism spending plan. The money would help stockpile vaccines and antibiotics, reinforce public health laboratories, increase food inspections and help state and local governments plan for bioterrorism.

"We know that hundreds, even millions, of lives may be at stake, and we are not ready yet," said Kennedy, who chairs the Senate's health committee.

Kennedy, who has proposed spending as much as $10 billion to counter bioterrorism, suggested he would be looking for more in the future; he called Thursday's plan a down payment.

The Bush administration had proposed $1.5 billion as part of its larger $40 billion emergency measure. Asked about the Senate bill, Thompson repeated President Bush's pledge not to exceed his total price tag.

Thompson said he would absolutely support the bill, but only "if we can work out the dollars." He suggested that the spending might be spread over at least two years.

Thompson told the House Commerce Committee that his staff was working virtually around the clock to negotiate an agreement to buy smallpox vaccine. The Bush budget assumed it would cost about $2 per dose, but manufacturers were asking for significantly more.

And Thompson's top bioterrorism adviser, Dr. D.A. Henderson, tried to calm members of the committee and the public, who worry that the highly contagious smallpox virus could be released before the government has bought enough vaccine for every American.

"We can respond quickly enough with the vaccine we have," said Henderson. He said Americans should not worry that smallpox will spread like the flu or like a wildfire across the country. "It does not do that."

Henderson, who led the worldwide campaign that eradicated smallpox, won a standing ovation from the committee for his work, a tribute virtually never seen.

issued a detailed list of who must take antibiotics for a full 60 days. That includes about 5,000 people who might have been exposed to anthrax and could still get sick if they were to stop taking the medication.

The CDC also made it clear that environmental cleanups at anthrax-infected buildings may leave trace amounts of the bacteria that would pose no risk.

THE QUESTIONS

Derek Boss sits down with head coach Jim Wooldridge

Q: How much of a factor do you think this year's recruiting class can play in the future of Wildcat basketball in building that base?

A: I think what I said about this recruiting class, that because it was so big in numbers, was it was designed to take care of a lot of different needs that we had. We need this class to be solid for us. We need these guys to perform this year to the best of their ability, and then we need them to return next year so that we can build on that core. We really can't afford to start over. So, I don't think we need to expect unrealistic things of these kids, but we do need this class — from top to bottom — to be solid for us and provide us with minutes this year, and then provide us with a bigger core of players for next year.

Q: With your main goal to improve, do you feel you couldn't ask for anything more than to play in a high-profile conference like the Big 12 where competition is so fierce?

A: That's the way I feel about it. I think our players and our coaches all feel like we want to go compete against every team in our league and see if we're up to the — I don't want to say 'challenge' — but that might be the word, to see where we are in this league as we move into this year. Are we better? Are we substantially better? That remains to be seen, but I think our guys are looking forward to it.

Q: With as much rivalry as there's been between K-State and KU, what would a victory over the Jayhawks this season do for the program, the fans and the confidence of the team?

A: Well, the obvious answer is going to be a lot. They're ranked in preseason polls as a Top-10 team in the country. Some people have even picked them to go to the Final Four. So, anytime you can perform well against competition like Kansas and give yourself a chance to win, it would certainly be a game that would be a confidence-booster for your team, and as well as your program.

Q: Do you have a sense that you have a certain go-to guy that you're going to be counting on this year?

A: I think right now we have candidates. We have several candidates, and a guy like Larry Reid is going to have to step up, and he's going to have to make plays for this team. And there's others — Gilson (DeJesus) — that just need to elevate their game. We'll see who those players are going to be, and that's going to be determined by the play. But we have more candidates this year than a year ago, and that's the positive, but a group of them are going to have to get above the trees.

Q: Bramlage Coliseum might never be like Ahearn Field House in a sense, but do you feel like it can create its own identity?

A: I think all that has to happen is for us to win games, and to prove to people and give them a reason to come in here. I think it can be a fantastic place to play this game, and quite frankly, I've been very pleased with what's happened so far in terms of support. This is a great place to play — I can't emphasize that enough. This is a great coliseum, and we can really make it a tough place for opponents to win a game.

Cats' quest for answers begins tonight

BY DEREK BOSS

Kansas State Collegian

Troy State seems to be practicing cold turkey.

K-State's opponent in tonight's season-opener at Bramlage Coliseum hasn't played a game in over eight months, dating back to last March.

The Trojans didn't schedule a single exhibition contest this fall, which might leave the squad a bit rusty.

Either way, one thing is for sure — it left the Wildcats in the dark as they seek their eighth-straight home-opening victory.

With no film of Troy State in action this year, head coach Jim Wooldridge and staff were left scrounging for information on the current Trojan team.

That's where K-State assistant coach Robbie Laing factored in.

Laing is a 1981 graduate of Troy State, of the Athletic Sun Conference, and was a two-year letterman in basketball.

Wooldridge said Laing's previous knowledge of the Trojan program, coupled with a few Louisiana acquaintances, shined a little light on the situation.

"He's got some buddies in that league down there that they play in," Wooldridge said. "They can't give us film — I think they've got some kind of conference rule like most of the conferences do — but we found out a little bit about their team, some tendencies. And he knew some of the players from being in that area those years that are currently on the team, so that's a little help."

So has been looking at tape of last season, Wooldridge said, which identified several aspects of Troy State's game, particularly its propensity to spread out and shoot the jump shot — often launching 25 treys per game.

The Trojans, second in their conference a year ago at 19-12 overall and 12-6 in league play, also return seven letter-winners and two starters — namely 6-foot-8 forward Lemayn Wilson and guard Robert Rushing, who both averaged over 14 points-per-game last season.

"We know they're going to put the ball up from anywhere on the floor," senior guard Larry Reid said, "but as long as we sustain our defense and attack them on offense, I think we'll be all right."

Reid was one of four players Wooldridge named Tuesday as starters for the season-opener, joining guard Gilson DeJesus, forward Travis Reynolds and center Pervis Pasco.

The fifth and final player will be determined based on the week's practice, Wooldridge said, with Quentin Buchanan, Janerio Spurlock and Nick Williams mentioned as candidates.

Buchanan, who started both Cat exhibition games this season, was benched the entire second half of K-State's 74-64 win over the NBC Thunder on Nov. 8.

"We're trying to get a little closer to gameday to determine what we're going to do with that position," Wooldridge said Tuesday. "You look for guys to play themselves into it — play up — and make it an easy decision."

Junior Matt Siebrandt said the team seems to be responding to Wooldridge's push — that playing time must be earned.

"He's just trying to show you that it's either 'my way or the highway,'" Siebrandt said, "and that's how it should be. We've got a good enough team where if you don't do your job, you're not going to play."

K-State sports fans should have faith in men's basketball team at season's start

What basketball preview would be complete without an expert's view of what could shape up to be another unpredictable basketball season?

But, since I'm not an expert, I figured I would just give you five reasons why this year's team can rise to the top of the nation's best conference.

1. A destiny that awaits our fearless leader.

Head coach Jim Wooldridge is a diamond in the rough. Success has followed him wherever he goes, and now it's time for K-State's program to evolve into the upstart that might even get a rise out of ESPN's crew when Big Monday rolls around in early 2002.

It's fate that Wooldridge would bring this team around and turn it into a Big 12 poster child, not just the whipping boy that programs like University of Kansas see on when they are up by 30 points. Roy, you'd better watch out when that cold day in February comes. Hell just might freeze over.

And, for the fans who ask why Wooldridge couldn't bring the glory days back in his first season — the answer again lies in fate. Not even the great Tex Winter took the Cats straight to the top. Winter started just 11-19 his first two seasons before giving the fans of Ahearn Field House something to cheer about.

2. The immediate effect of Pervis Pasco. Possibly the most talked about recruit in recent years, Pervis can do it all. The Wildcats' two exhibition games alluded to some weaknesses in K-State's perimeter game. If that is the case, Pasco could turn into more of an impact player.

Either way, Pasco has a legitimate chance to post a double-double each night he steps on the floor. It's been 31 years since David Hall averaged a double-double for the Cats. Look for the 6-foot-9 junior to contribute similarly.

3. K-State's dedication to winning.

"There's a lot of dedication — guys on this team come from a lot of winning programs and each player is committed to individual as well as team success, so I think we will be a good team," senior guard Larry Reid said.

Reid couldn't have put it any better. Wooldridge has brought in nothing but the best to propel this program into the 21st century. Reid, along with the tag-team duo from Junction City, Quentin Buchanan and Travis Reynolds, and senior Matt Siebrandt took their respective high school teams to the state tournament.

4. Production from the bench.

Although Wooldridge didn't reveal a set-starting five at Tuesday's talk with the media, expect a bench that will be a little more visible than last year's. Not only will the Cats suit up the same number of players as seats on the bench, but from the looks of things, K-State will not have to call upon football players to contribute to the success of this year's squad.

More or less, anticipate the supporting cast of players like Janerio Spurlock, Nick Williams, Travis Canby, Gilson DeJesus and Marcus Hayes to be significant contributors.

5. Role of 'Wooldridge's Warriors'.

No team can be a success without the support of fans. Consistently, more fans have piled into Bramlage Coliseum, but if the Wildcats falter, a few more fans shy away. Now is the time where the fans of K-State can make their presence known and help lead this team to glory. Wooldridge summed it up perfectly when he said the players play better when they have the backing of people in the community and students of the university.

So be ready for a roller-coaster kind of year, baby. Wooldridge himself made a prediction that the team would go 26-1 this season. He had to be joking, right?

BY DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

K-State knows the adversity in bouncing back from a loss this season.

Head coach Bill Snyder's club tried to do it three consecutive times in October — and failed.

But the beginning of the Wildcats' four-game losing skid this fall was not a loss where the team appeared to play all that bad.

Rather, it was a tight game against a highly-ranked opponent, one in which quarterback Eli Roberson received national acclaim for his 372 yards of total offense.

It was a 38-37 defeat at the hands of then-No. 3 Oklahoma on Sept. 29.

With that prompted a downward spiral for K-State, as the Sooners loss carried over to the Colorado game, then to the Texas Tech contest, and finally to the matchup with Texas A&M before redemption was found against Kansas.

This weekend, K-State faces a similar situation.

The Cats are again coming off a close loss to a Top-5 opponent — 31-21 at then-No. 2 Nebraska last Saturday — and Snyder's crew seemed to play well, too, despite failing to capitalize on several key opportunities.

"It hurt. It hurt bad," linebacker Ben Leber said, "because if you look at it, we played well enough to win. It just didn't happen. So you look at that, and it's just tough to take. I thought we played them real tough. I thought we had the game won."

So will K-State's loss to the Cornhuskers cause the same chain reaction as the Oklahoma defeat?

Chain reaction or not, with only two games left on the Cats' regular season schedule — and both must-wins in terms of bowl eligibility — Snyder knows he can't afford to let history repeat itself, and he told his players just that after the Nebraska contest.

"I would certainly caution them to take control of their feelings and not allow that to happen again as it did the last time," Snyder said. "But I think it's an individual thing. I think it is an individual thing for players, coaches, fans — for most anyone. What do you do about it? You appeal to an individual pride in their own performance."

"We're on display. Saturday afternoon, we'll be on display, just as we were this last Saturday, and I think young people want to be perceived as being something. And if you've got your dapper down, they're smart enough to figure out that they're not going to be perceived the way they want to be perceived."

Senior free safety Jon McGraw said perception has much to do with it, although some losses take individuals longer to hurdle.

"It's difficult after you put so much work into something," McGraw said. "You bust your butt all year round, you get 13 chances to make something good come of it, and then you're so close, and you miss the opportunity.

"It breaks your heart, and it's hard to bounce back from it. It hits some guys harder than others, and it's just a matter of them individually saying, 'Hey, I'm going to get over this and continue to work hard for the next week.'"

Quarterback Eli Roberson might need to tell himself that before facing Louisiana Tech (6-3, 6-1), a team that has clinched a share of the Western Athletic Conference division title. The Bulldogs have won three straight, including five of its last six.

Despite rushing for 119 yards and executing the Cats' option game against Nebraska, Roberson completed just 1-of-11 passes and threw two costly interceptions, which led to 10 Husker points.

K-State won't be able to make those types of mistakes against Louisiana Tech, Snyder said.

"That's been a very intricate part of their success, creating turnovers with their defense," he said, "and consequently, they have been able to play some very fine football teams either to the wire or beat them."

Snyder said the quarterback situation still was up in the air as of Tuesday, but whether it's Roberson or Marc Dunn who makes the start, the Cats must continue to put the ball in the air to keep the Bulldog defense honest.

And hopefully, he said, they'll throw to the right colored shirts.

"The thing is, you've just got to throw it to our guy, or in the ground or someplace," Snyder said. "You just can't throw it to other people. It's not the passing game. It's turnovers that hurt you."

But Leber said one thing is certain — K-State must play with the right mentality instead of dwelling on the Nebraska loss if they expect to qualify for a bowl game this winter.

"It's tough, just kind of picking up your bearings and getting refocused for the next week," Leber said, "but I think we've had enough ups and downs this season that we should be pretty accustomed to it. I think the focus and everything like that is back on this week — back on La Tech, where it should be."

K-State defense to tackle new challenge against Louisiana Tech

K-State senior linebacker Ben Leber wrestles Nebraska quarterback Eric Crouch to the ground during last weekend's game in Lincoln, Neb. The Wildcats lost to the Huskers, 31-21, extending Nebraska's winning streak over the Cats at Memorial Stadium to 16 games.

BY SEAN PURCELL
Kansas State Collegian

Containing an opponents' running game always has been the bread and butter of K-State's defense. However, teams have had their way at times with the Wildcats when they've had to put the ball in the air this year.

That could spell trouble when Louisiana Tech, the nation's third-best passing offense, comes to town Saturday.

And for defensive coordinator Phil Bennett, the change in pace has turned into a long week of preparation.

"I will tell you, in 23 years, 18 of them coordinating, I have never had to switch gears like we are doing from last week to this week," Bennett said. "It has been a sleepless couple of days trying to prepare for them, and honest to God, they do so much stuff and do it well, so this will be a challenge for our defense."

Quarterback Luke McCown spearheads a Bulldog offense that ranks fifth in scoring at 39.6 points per game. McCown himself is in the top 30 in pass efficiency and ranks second in both completions per game (27.3) and total offense (354.4 ypg). McCown and three receivers in the top 20 in receptions, will prove to be quite a different test for a team that just finished playing the best rushing team in the nation.

"It's going to be a lot different," defensive back Terence Newman said. "At Nebraska, we didn't have to really worry about the pass and with La Tech, we don't have to worry much about the run, so it will be a different style of game because we will have six or seven defensive backs in the game at a time."

In two of K-State's five losses this season, the Cats were bombarded by the aerial assault. Oklahoma tallied 316 yards through the air, giving K-State its first loss of the year, then Texas Tech racked up 409 passing yards and handled the Cats in Lubbock. Head coach Bill Snyder said a little more weight than usual will be put on the shoulders of the defensive backs this weekend to step it up.

"You better play confident in the secondary, and that comes with each young guy and what his responsibilities are," Snyder said. "I don't think there is any reason for our players to not have confidence in their ability, because we've played defensively very well — the concern is going to be that of all the teams we have played, the two teams that throw for a living have totaled 725 yards against us, so we've got to sharpen our game up and be a little better than we have been."

Film sessions might be the Cats' biggest weapon to combat the Bulldog passing entourage, linebacker Ben Leber said. Being able to look back at the mistakes in previous games and improve on them will be a vital element in solving the Cat pass defense woes.

"Had we not had the experience with OU and Texas Tech, I think it would be a harder transition," Leber said. "We made a lot of mistakes in those games, so we will have to go back and see what we did and improve during practice."

BY MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Playing in a lower-tier bowl in a season of high expectations usually has been a kiss of death for K-State's football team.

In 1994, the No. 8 Cats faced unranked Boston College in the Aloha Bowl. Then quarterback Chad May and other players had expressed dissatisfaction with the bowl. Nonetheless, K-State played a subpar game and lost 12-7.

Then in 1998, the No. 4 Cats finished the season 11-1, but played in the Alamo Bowl after a perceived snub by the BCS bowls. Once again, K-State's opponent, Purdue, was unranked, and shocked the Cats 37-34.

Now, in 2001, if the 4-5 Cats go to a bowl, it most likely will land in the Galleryfurniture.com Bowl or the Mainstay Independence Bowl as the Big 12 Conference's seventh or sixth team. The opponents probably would be unranked Southern Mississippi or LSU, respectively.

However, this year the Cats don't feel snubbed. They'd be happy just to be in a bowl at all, senior free safety Jon McGraw said.

"We don't feel like anybody owes us anything. The reason we're in the position we are is a direct result of what we've done this season," he said. "I think everyone's just hoping to get a chance to go to a bowl game, and we're not going to be upset because we don't get a certain bowl we want. Beggars can't be choosers. I think we're sort of in that position right now."

That position is disappointing nevertheless, junior quarterback Marc Dunn said.

"It's been difficult. I've never been through an experience like this. Likewise for the rest of our team. It's been difficult for all of us," he said. "We have to be man enough to cope with the disappointment not only with ourselves, but with peers and fans. It's a hard thing to do, but you can't point a finger at anybody else but yourself. We've put ourselves in position to win games, and we haven't done it. Realistically, we can't really say anything but just try to get better."

While a less prestigious bowl is disappointing for the players, just qualifying for a bowl game is an accomplishment considering that earlier in the season, K-State had a record of 2-4.

"Right now, our circumstances, we're a 4-5 team, and us going to a bowl game with winning two more games is actually a pretty good thing," Dunn said. "Of course, it's not going to be as prestigious as a Rose Bowl game, but for the circumstances we're in right now, it's going to be a good accomplishment for this team."

Thinking ahead to even the Galleryfurniture.com Bowl could be dangerous for K-State, though, since it has to win its final two games to be eligible for postseason play. As a result, there is plenty of motivation for K-State to finish out the season well, head coach Bill Snyder said.

"I would think in some cases we are maybe more motivated, and I say that for this reason. It's not a matter of whether it's a lesser bowl, it's a matter of whether it's a bowl or not," he said. "It's a matter of where you are for Christmas, and they haven't experienced that before. I think that might have some impact

Cats won't lose to WAC team

Sometimes I feel bad for the WAC. Not often, but sometimes.

Those teams from the Western Athletic Conference are the butts of just about every college football joke in the book.

Other than the joke of a season we turned out this fall.

It just wasn't the same Wildcat squad fans have grown accustomed to seeing Saturdays, and I'll admit, it's a bit disheartening. K-State had posted four straight 11-win seasons prior to this debacle, including the fourth best record in the country since 1996.

Now, I'm not criticizing the heart or effort put forth by this year's team, and don't get me wrong, I don't think it's time to throw in the towel.

Far from it.

In fact, I'm confident it was just a bump in the road for head coach Bill Snyder's club, and look for them back in the Big 12 title picture next season.

But back to the WAC.

The worthless teams in this conference are the epitome of all that is soulless and wrong in college athletics today. OK, maybe I'm going a bit overboard, but who the heck would claim ownership of this league?

It's the conference that gets stuck with the leftovers. Just look at Rice and SMU. These two schools were former members of the Southwest Conference before the league disbanded in 1995.

Programs such as Texas, Texas Tech, Texas A&M and Baylor joined the Big Eight — making the Big 12 — and Houston and TCU were added to Conference USA, which has a few respectable schools in Louisville and Southern Miss.

But guess where Rice and SMU ended up — that's right. The WAC.

Fresno State made some noise early this season but fizzled out, and Hawaii and Boise State have put up some good numbers this year — but the WAC's the WAC. No exceptions.

Speaking of the WAC, K-State takes on good ol' Louisiana Tech on Saturday (you knew I had to be going somewhere with this WAC thing). And how the heck did a Louisiana school end up in the Western Athletic Conference anyway?

I guess geography isn't one of their strong suits.

Anyway, if the Bulldogs think they can come into Manhattan this weekend and throw all over the Wildcats, they can think again.

K-State gave up enough yardage through the air against other pass-happy teams like Oklahoma and Texas Tech this season — over 700 — to last four or five games. Plus, DeRon Tyler's done an outstanding job at cornerback since he began starting the last half of the year.

The Cats' defense is just clicking on all cylinders, and that doesn't give opposing offenses a chance.

Now, as long as K-State's offense follows the defense's lead, the purple will win its last two games and qualify for a bowl game.

If not, maybe it's time to join the WAC.

CURIOUS CAT

Sophomore quarterback Eli Roberson takes the Memorial Stadium field in Lincoln, Neb., last weekend against the Nebraska Cornhuskers. Roberson struggled through the air, completing just one of 11 passes on the day, but led all rushers in K-State's 31-21 loss to the Huskers. The Cats return to KSU Stadium this weekend to take on the Louisiana State Bulldogs in the first of two must-win games.

on how motivated they become for this ball game."

Even more motivation can be drawn from the importance that a bowl game could be in developing K-State's younger players. Playing in a bowl game means getting several more weeks of practice.

"That's one of the things that we have benefited from in my eyes in the past eight or nine years, because we have had the opportunity to take advantage of those additional practices," Snyder said. "You know how we have been. We have taken advantage of virtually all of them. We have taken those unlimited opportunities to try and get better, to try and work with younger play."

So with rounds one and two not favoring the Cats' corner, the defense still is confident they can rebound and respond to the challenge, Newman said.

Prepare for round three.

"We are a lot better than we were before, because we saw the things we did wrong against Texas Tech and worked on them the next week to get better," Newman said.

"I am excited to play them, because I didn't see much action against Nebraska. This week, I won't have to worry about that."

Paint fumes cause illness in Waters

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

A K-State political science professor had to seek medical attention after exposure to concentrated paint fumes while teaching in Waters 333 on Nov. 6.

Linda Richter said she was standing in her classroom at 10:30 a.m. with the door and windows open.

"An awful, strange smell came wafting through the room," Richter said. "It hit my throat instantly, which started burning."

The Department of Entomology had contracted out Cheney Construction to paint metal cabinets in Waters 27 on Nov. 6. The painters finished the job Nov. 8.

Richter said she had to leave the room because she could not stand the smell. By noon, she suffered from impaired vision, a sore throat and a severe headache, and her eyes had begun to swell. She went home.

Since her symptoms persisted two days later, she contacted Steve Galitzer, director of public safety, who suggested that she go to the emergency room. She did not feel well enough to visit a doctor until Nov. 9, three days after her exposure, she said.

She said her doctor did not know how to treat her until he discovered what chemicals she had been exposed to.

"The doctor at the emergency room said the problem would resolve itself and told me to go home," she said. "Then, he called me at home and said I had been exposed to very bad stuff."

Galitzer said the polyurethane paint she was exposed to was an epoxy paint. Two materials within the paint combined to make a resistant surface on the metal cabinets, which is so strong it protects against damage from other chemical spills, he said.

"It contained flammable and organic solvents that have inherent medical problems," he said. "The material was mixed with air, and vapors were pulled through the building by the air. We advise any employee who thinks they were exposed to it to fill out an accident report and seek medical attention."

Students who feel they have been exposed can be treated at Lafene Health Center, he said.

He said his office was not notified of the paint's presence on campus until Nov. 8.

"We informed people and tried to stop the process, but by the time we got there, the work was all done. We advised Cheney that they can't do that type of work without ventilation."

Ron Cheney, owner of Cheney

Construction had no comment. Cheney Construction also is working on Ackert Hall.

In most outside contractor work on campus, Division of Facilities Planning architects and engineers go through a process with the contractor and department, he said.

"In smaller projects like this, Planning didn't need to be involved," he said. "There should have been a meeting before the project started where safety would have been discussed. That didn't happen."

"We're doing everything we can to prevent something like this from happening again. This was one of those things that fell through the cracks, which happens unfortunately."

In the future, when contractors are involved, he said there will be more communication.

K-State professor dies; university plans service

Robert Poresky, associate professor of family studies and human services, died Nov. 13 at Mercy Health Center.

"Dr. Poresky will be greatly missed by the School of Family Studies and Human Services," said Bill Meredith, director of the School of Family Studies and Human Services. "Students were very important to him, and he served as an important influence in many of their lives."

Poresky lived in Manhattan for the past 29 years and began working at K-State in September 1972 as an assistant professor in the department. He was then promoted to an associate professor in August 1977.

His research interests included examining the bond between children and pets and its effects on child development, childcare, relationships between pets and their owners and effects of home environment and parental actions on child development.

Most recently, his research focused on the assessment of drug and alcohol rehabilitation programs and state safety belt study.

Meredith said Poresky devoted his professional life to the benefit of young children.

"He also served as an important foundation piece for the school by donating large grants and contracts, which provided many students with assistantships," Meredith said.

Poresky, a graduate of Cornell University, received a bachelor's degree in psychology in child development and family relations. He is survived by his wife Barbara Keebaugh, daughters Pamela Baker and Laura Poresky, his parents and his brothers, Richard Poresky and Donald Poresky.

Mary DeLuccie, associate professor and coordinator for early childhood education, said Poresky was influential in improving the care children received from childcare facilities locally and across states.

"He was a wonderful colleague," she said.

Community culture

The audience applauded mid-performance Sunday in Forum Hall in response and appreciation to an intricate drum sequence played by Swar Sangam as part of the 2001 India Sanskriti.

The event, which showcased Indian culture for the community, was sponsored by the Indian Student Association.

The program featured music and dancing of India, home to one-fifth of all international students at K-State. The program included not only several Hindi songs, but also Swar Sangam, a group of six individuals playing musical instruments.

The show also included a traditional dress show that depicted the various styles of dress prevalent in different regions of the country. A skit from the Indian musical-comedy also was performed for the audience.

Shahid Dalvi, graduate student in computer science, attended the event to meet people and watch the program.

"We miss home a lot, and this is our only chance to get together and be like we're home," he said.

With the American holiday of Thanksgiving quickly approaching, Dalvi said he admits it increases his homesickness a little more.

"Everyone is looking forward to going home and seeing their folks, and all I can think of is catching up on my homework, and it really does make you miss home," Dalvi said.

"And then it is Christmas, and the same thing happens, and it is the same."

Dalvi also offered his thanks to the K-State community.

"It has been difficult times since Sept. 11, and I want to thank everyone at K-State, including my students and my teachers and everyone, for being so nice," Dalvi said.

The event takes place every year in November, which is the festival time in India, said Manpreet Singh, vice president of the Indian Student Association.

The event includes the program in Forum Hall, a dinner of Indian food at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, and a concert at All Faiths Chapel.

The association invites professional musicians to play the Indian music. This year, musicians from the Raja Govindarajan and Group performed for the crowd.

"It is for everyone. We sell tickets for everyone — all international students, Americans, anyone with an interest in culture and good food," Singh said.

The association aims at creating a community for international students at K-State.

"When they come away from home, we invite new people to come so they don't feel out of place," Singh said.

The association was host to more events throughout the year, Singh said. The organization sponsored a cultural event in October and a welcome function in August for students new to campus. The group also is planning a picnic in the spring to bring the community together again.

"This is for all the people. We really want all the people to come enjoy and be a part of our community," Singh said, "and we are a part of their community. We want that interaction."

U.S.-led attacks continue against al-Qaeda forces

BY ROBERT BURNS
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Terrorist mastermind Osama bin Laden and his al-Qaeda network are on the run in Afghanistan and their Taliban supporters are in disarray, but the American-led military campaign to crush them is far from over, senior administration officials said Sunday.

Secretary of State Colin Powell and Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz, in separate talk show interviews, both said they have no reason to believe bin Laden has escaped Afghanistan.

"I have seen no intelligence or information to suggest" he has left, Powell said on ABC's "This Week."

The Taliban's envoy to Pakistan said Saturday that bin Laden had left Afghanistan, but that has not been substantiated. Later, the diplomat said he meant only that bin Laden was outside areas under Taliban control.

Powell, Wolfowitz and national security adviser Condoleezza Rice all suggested bin Laden's room to maneuver is shrinking, his options narrowing.

"It's getting harder for him to hide as more and more territory is removed from Taliban control," Powell said. "I don't think there's any country in the region that would be anxious to give him guest privileges if he showed up."

Wolfowitz described bin Laden as in very great danger of being killed or captured.

"This is a man on the run who's doing his best to hide," Wolfowitz said on CBS's "Face the Nation."

Added Rice: "We're beginning to narrow his possibilities for hiding."

Powell said the Central Intelligence Agency has been doing "some rather splendid work with respect to our activities in Afghanistan, working alongside our military forces that are inside in Afghanistan."

The Washington Post reported Sunday the CIA has paramilitary forces in Afghanistan; Powell would not confirm that.

"I think we've got a very fine linkup between our intelligence assets, our military assets, all within the framework of a good political and military strategy," Powell said on ABC's "This Week." "And it's now starting to show rather significant results."

If bin Laden were to flee Afghanistan, the United States would keep up the hunt, Wolfowitz said.

"We are going to continue pursuing him," he said. "Let's also remember, we're going to continue pursuing the entire al-Qaeda network, which is in 60 countries, not just Afghanistan and, worst of all, here in the United States. ... This is a campaign against all the global terrorist networks and the states that support terrorism."

Powell said no country on the periphery of Afghanistan — even China — would give bin Laden a haven.

"I don't think this fellow is going to be welcome anywhere," he said. "He is an outcast. He is a murderer, he's a terrorist. ... He is on the run, just as the president said he would be. And we will get him."

Rice cautioned against assuming that the military successes in Afghanistan over the past week mean the United States has met its main objective.

"This may take a while," she said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Students can give tickets for MU game to soldiers

Students who do not plan on attending the Nov. 24 football game against Missouri can donate their tickets to Fort Riley soldiers as part of the K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics' Rally for Riley.

Tickets can be turned in to the Office of Student Activities and Services until Tuesday.

"This is an opportunity for students who choose to stay home during Thanksgiving break to do something positive with their tickets that would have gone to waste," said Ryan Walker, vice Student Senate chair.

Bob Cavello, associate director of the athletic department had contacted Walker with the idea and asked for assistance in collecting the tickets.

Walker said it is important to the department to have a large crowd at the game and donating tickets to Fort Riley soldiers is a good way to reward community members who might never have been able to attend a game otherwise.

"I think as a K-State community, this is a way we can show support and gratitude to soldiers at Fort Riley," he said.

Ticket priority will go to lower-income families who normally would not be able to afford the tickets, he said.

Soldiers with tickets will not need to show student IDs at the game.

"We've taken for granted what the armed forces have done for us," he said. "Since Sept. 11, they have been willing to show us how willing they are able to react and protect our way of life. Rally for Riley is a great way to show them just how much we appreciate them."

Stretch of state highway named after WWJD author

TOPEKA — A stretch of U.S. 24 that runs through the capital has been dedicated to a local minister whose 1896 book asked readers "What Would Jesus Do?"

The mile of the highway in Topeka's city limits was dedicated Saturday as the Charles Sheldon Trafficway, the result of action taken by the 2001 Legislature. The Rev. Charles Sheldon was minister of Topeka's Central Congregational Church and wrote "In His Steps."

Axel break causes portion of train to derail by Sylvia

SYLVIA — About a dozen cars of a Burlington Northern Santa Fe freight train derailed Saturday near Sylvia after an axle on a boxcar broke, authorities said.

Three of four cars containing beef entrails tipped over onto their sides during the derailment while the other eight cars remained upright, said Reno County Undersheriff Scott Beardslee.

Beardslee said no hazardous materials were involved, and the remaining cars in the train left the site about an hour after the accident.

Survey on smallpox shows some support for vaccine

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Three-fifths of Americans say they would want a smallpox vaccination if it were widely available, according to an Associated Press poll that suggests continued nervousness about bioterrorism.

About half of the respondents say they are concerned about the threat of a smallpox attack and think last month's anthrax attacks are the beginning of an extended campaign, according to the poll conducted for The AP by ICR of Media, Pa.

Some of those still concerned about bioterrorism say they generally are nervous because they do not know what's coming next.

The U.S. government is stockpiling the smallpox vaccine in case of terrorist attacks, but has no plans to vaccinate routinely the general public. Smallpox vaccine is made with a live virus related to smallpox, so it can cause some very serious side effects. Experts estimate that if every American were vaccinated against smallpox, some 400 people would die from the vaccine.

A majority of Americans indicate they would get the vaccine if it were available, even after they were informed of the possible risks.

U.S. Navy begins search for pair of missing sailors

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The U.S. Navy was searching Sunday for two U.S. sailors missing in waters of the Persian Gulf after the sinking of an oil tanker they and other security forces had boarded, officials said.

The identities of the two sailors were not released, pending notification of relatives.

A statement issued Sunday by U.S. Naval Forces Central Command headquarters in Bahrain said the tanker, named Samara, sank at about 4:45 a.m. local time Sunday (8:45 p.m. Saturday) in the northern Gulf. It did not say what caused the ship to sink.

The tanker had been boarded by U.S. sailors because it was carrying an estimated 1,700 metric tons of Iraqi oil in violation of U.N. sanctions against Iraq, officials said. The tanker had a crew of 14 Iraqis. Ten Iraqis were recovered alive after the tanker sank. One Iraqi was found dead, and three were missing.

In addition to the two American sailors missing, six others were recovered alive, officials said.

Homeless for Hunger

Homeless for Hunger, which has been running for two years, helps raise money for the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Students pretended to be homeless from Nov. 4 through Nov. 7. Each participant pays $30 and receives $100 from local businesses to sleep out at different sororities for a few nights.

Kevin Husmann, junior in electrical engineering, led Homeless for Hunger this year.

"It was an enlightening experience," said Husmann, whose participation for the first year. "It wasn't as bad as it would be if you were really homeless."

This year 32 participants raised $1,700 for the cause and collected canned goods door-to-door.

Students were allowed to bring the small amount of necessities they felt they could survive off of and were not able to return home during the four days, Husmann said.

Dan Sobek, philanthropy chair for the Alpha Tau Omega fraternity, also worked with Husmann in running the event.

"He contributed a lot," he said. Husmann said experiencing the life of the homeless for a week was a great way to bring people together.

"It gave us a chance to be a part of it," he said.

Students enrolled in the one-credit hour basketball class shoot around before playing a game last Thursday. Students can take the one-credit hour classes to get involved or relieve stress.

Students play games for credit

BY MAGGIE GRUSZNIS
Kansas State Collegian

Whether looking to get fit, relieve stress or just to pick up extra credit, students are filling up the activity classes offered by the Department of Kinesiology department.

Larry Noble, professor of kinesiology, said most of the classes that are offered close early each semester. "The demand exceeds the supply," Noble said.

The kinesiology department offers five activity classes — basketball, aerobic dance, fitness and conditioning, jogging and weight training.

The objective of these classes is for students to get involved. Noble said about 10 percent of the class involves cognitive exercises, but the majority of the class consists of participation.

"We provide information and practice to develop experience and to enhance the quality of life," Noble said.

Mike Cowan, junior in elementary education, was enrolled in basketball. He said the class relieved his stress from all his other courses.

"It was fun. I strongly recommend this class for other students," Cowan said.

Liz Johnson, graduate student in

Matt Stamey/Collegian

Students play basketball in Ahearn Field House during their basketball class. The Department of Kinesiology offers five different activity classes.

kinesiology, teaches two of the five weight-training classes offered this semester. Johnson said she wants her students to set goals for themselves.

She has her students keep a training log, which calculates overall activity and weight. The log allows the students to keep track of how much weight they lifted, how many exercises they did, and how many weight repetitions they completed each time they trained.

Johnson said her grading varies according to each student. She looks at how each individual participates and improves.

"I pretty much grade on showing up and learning," Johnson said.

Ben Schlorholtz, senior in psychology, took weight training because he wanted to get in shape.

Schlorholtz said he was more likely to stay motivated and complete his fitness goal with the class because he also wanted to receive an "A."

Students such as Mackenzie Dewerff, junior in electronic engineering, have enrolled in activity classes for next semester. Dewerff said she is excited about the class.

"I'm taking the class with one of my friends," she said. "We both thought it would be a nice change from our regular classes."

Travel industry officials forecast lower numbers in Thanksgiving air travel

BY KECIA N. SEYB
Kansas State Collegian

About 2.2 million fewer Americans will take a Thanksgiving trip this year compared to last year, officials have projected.

"We expect a drop of 6 percent," said Cherie Sage, public affairs coordinator for AAA Kansas. "Really, the largest percent decrease is expected to come from fewer people deciding not to fly this holiday."

Sage said AAA also is expecting 87 percent of travelers to go by motor vehicle — the highest percentage ever recorded by the association.

The largest percentage change in the number by automobiles is in the Northeast, she said.

"And that's not a surprise. Actually, those in the Northeast also will have a 6.1 increase in automobile travel," she said. "This is surprising considering the rest of the country is still seeing an overall decrease as a lot of people are deciding not to travel at all or stay locally."

One of the reasons for the increase in motor vehicle travel is low gasoline prices, Sage said, making it very economical to drive. She said gas prices have gone up a couple of cents, but overall, she said prices should stay low.

"We never look long-term with gas prices, but after the holidays, we plan for them to decline. At this time," Sage said.

With flights, she said, prices also are low, which is because all airlines have fewer scheduled flights.

After Sept. 11, she said all the airlines cut back on the number of flights offered per day and also had to cut back on staff because flights weren't able to fill to capacity.

She said AAA is trying to let the general public know that flying is safe. She said she knows people are apprehensive, especially following the airplane crash in New York.

"It was a real tragedy that happened. At this time, it looked as though it was some kind of mechanical problem," she said. "We do know that we do take a risk every time we fly, but we do when we get in a vehicle too. It's a real rarity for this to happen — for a mechanical action to cause this sort of crash, but air travel still remains the safest mode of travel."

At Kansas City International Airport, Kansas City International Aviation Department officials anticipate 340,000 travelers will use KCI during the week and a half surrounding the Thanksgiving holiday, which is about 8 percent fewer than last year.

Erica Hupp, KCI spokeswoman, said the airport's flight schedule is operating at about 90 percent right now, with a 12.4 percent decrease in daily seat offerings compared to last year. She said the numbers show that there probably will be a decrease in holiday flights, but she's just not certain how much.

Hupp said lower flight fares could entice more people to fly. Typically the holiday season is not the time to lower flight fares, as they usually are at their highest, she said.

But airlines had to do something in order to get people back to flying.

"We're bringing my brother home from Alaska for $587," she said.

"That's good from Alaska. He was expecting to pay $1,000 or more. It's really good fare. I know someone else who is flying to Manchester — round trip, $182. They're really good prices."

She also said she encouraged people to fly, as it is safer to fly than ever before with heightened security. She said people need to remember not to bring scissors, knives or other such items on board. She said holiday travelers also should not wrap their presents. Security officials will unwrap them, she said.

"One carry-on and a bag filled with gifts is a no-no," Hupp said. "One carry-on — period."

She said to allow ample time at the airport because lines will be longer with the additional security measures.

Clint Leahew, freshman in public relations, said he is just driving home to Salina for Thanksgiving, but if he had somewhere to fly, he would, especially with the low flight fares.

"Right now's the safest time you could," he said. "Security's at the highest."

"Planes are going to crash, but it's still safer to fly than drive."

Travel information

KCI is asking those who fly to keep the following travel tips in mind:

- Allow ample time to park, get to the terminal, check in and go through security.
- Be prepared to show a government-issued photo ID. A passenger might be asked to produce this ID again at other stages of the check-in process. Please be prepared to show ID as well as boarding cards at each stage of the boarding process.
- Passengers should mark all luggage inside and out with their name, address and destination phone number before check-in. Do not leave any belongings unattended, even for a few minutes, and do not accept a bag or parcel from any unknown person. Air travelers should be prepared to answer questions concerning their own baggage when checking in.
- To facilitate the screening process, passengers should remove all metal objects prior to passing through the metal detectors and limit the number of metal objects worn.
- Always carry medicine, cash, jewelry, passports, visas, business papers and other valuables such as cameras on board with you.
- Due to heightened security screening at airports, gift-wrapped packages cannot go through security checkpoints. It is highly advised that all gifts be mailed. If air passengers must travel with gifts, it is best to pack them unwrapped in checked luggage because of new limitations on the number of carry-on items.

Cats for Cans convenient way to help families

The next time you are at the store, you should pick up some extra nonperishables and donate them to Cats for Cans.

Cats for Cans is a collaborative effort between Flint Hills Breadbasket and K-State. The project fosters an easy, accessible way for K-Staters to give to the community for the holiday season. The cans donated will go toward Flint Hills Breadbasket, which gives local holiday food baskets.

There are many in our community who are in need. While most of us might not have a lot of money or time, just picking up some extra cans of good food can go a long way.

Several university groups are sponsoring this program. You can drop off cans at any K-State athletic event and some departments on campus.

Take some time to reflect on how fortunate we all are during this holiday season. Let the spirit of giving move you to spend a few dollars and give to others who are truly in need.

Yeah, two guys come to your door exactly alike. How do you tell if they are Mormon or frat boys? Yep, nametags.

I have a splinter in my nose.

Yes, I would like to thank the women of Delta Delta Delta for alphabetizing their ad by first names so I know there is three Justins, four Matts, and two Adams. Way to go, ladies.

And six Ryans.

I'd just like to thank all the janitors who keep this campus so clean and nice. It keeps me motivated to stay in school.

People have no right being rude. If I chose to be a little loud in the middle of the day, then they can just choose to go to the library.

Susan Powell, you crack me up.

Widely-read Fourum gives opportunity to voice opinions

Keira Mann

Every day, hundreds of K-State students pick up their copies of the Collegian. After browsing the headlines on the front page and searching for familiar names in the police reports, they usually flip to the opinion page.

Why the opinion page? Contrary to what you might think, it is not to read my columns. The opinion page is well-read because on the right-side bar rests the most-read section of the paper — the Fourum.

I remember reading the Fourum for the first time when I was a freshman. I had only been in school for a couple of weeks and had not discovered the Collegian.

One day, when walking to breakfast, a residence hall friend handed me a copy of the paper, folded to the opinion page and told me to read it when I got the chance.

I sat down to my fine Derby Dining Center breakfast and began reading. As I browsed through the random comments made by anonymous callers, I began to chuckle. By the time I had read the final comments, I was laughing out loud.

"This is so cool," I thought to myself. From that day forward, I picked up a copy of the newspaper and read the Fourum first thing in the morning. It became a natural pick-me-up to my morning routine.

The beauty of the Fourum is its anonymity. Anyone can call into the Fourum and say virtually anything the person wants. If these comments are called in by a certain time, they will be printed for the entire campus to read.

A diverse compilation of comments exists on that side bar. Students sound off on topics ranging from the overpopulation of squirrels to the stupidity of their roommates, to the budget cuts and tuition hikes affecting the university. No topic is restricted, as students are given the opportunity to say exactly what is on their minds without having to take credit for saying it.

The reason so many students read the Fourum is because the comments on the page are unrestricted. They express the true feelings of many K-Staters. I don't know how many times I have read a comment and had to suppress my laughter in class, as I think to myself, "So true, so true."

On the downside, some really do not like the Fourum. Truthfully, as a columnist, it has caused me many moments of frustration. On occasion, I will read the things people call in and say about my columns, and I'll want to scream, "No, you idiot, you missed the entire point!" However, because I have no idea who made the comment, it is impossible to give a rebuttal.

If there is one thing I have learned in my semesters as a columnist, it is not to take the Fourum too seriously. The majority of people who call in are just looking for a good laugh, and when you read the campus Fourum, you have to take it as just that, a good laugh.

Besides, I get half of an entire page to express my opinions once a week, so why shouldn't other students have the opportunity to express themselves publicly? Keep calling the Fourum.

I guarantee that people will keep reading it. For many students, like myself, reading the Fourum is an amusing, and occasionally enlightening way, to start the day.

Clash of the Columnists

Clash of the Columnists is a weekly rotating series. Each week, two columnists will write columns taking a stance on an issue that was assigned to them.

I'll admit it — I've called the Campus Fourum before.

And I said something slightly unkind about a specific person. It was just a cruel thought expressed amongst friends until someone got the idea to call the Fourum. I felt deviant and mean, but I was shrouded in anonymity.

The quote ran in the next day's paper, and guilt quickly set in. I couldn't wait for the day to be over. My sarcastic opinion didn't look quite the same printed alongside outlooks on mullets and football games.

I couldn't hide behind the notion that no one would read my little remark. The Fourum is one of the most read items in the Collegian.

Whether comments merely are kidding or completely serious, the opinions in the Fourum will be read.

However, it's not just conversation with one or two people. About 22,396 students, 1,170 faculty members, staff, Manhattan residents and countless eCollegian readers have the opportunity to see those comments.

The anonymous nature of the Campus Fourum hides callers' identities, but the thought is there for everyone to see. That anonymity can allow us to be goofy, silly and fun.

On the other hand, it allows us to be cowards. The lines of social acceptance are blurred when you don't have to face your actions or thoughts. You can be as cruel, stupid or impetuous as you want.

Conversations about hairstyles can go on for years. Beer-guzzling sports fans can criticize athletes without having to move from the couch.

It's a one-way conversation that allows you to ignore the reactions of others.

In real life, feedback from others causes us to censor our thoughts — or at least how we express them.

Just look what happens when a professor asks a question in a lecture hall. Everyone clams up. We're afraid to look foolish when our names and faces are attached. The Fourum takes away the names and faces, but not the foolishness.

In the last few editions of the Campus Fourum there were comments about cheerleaders, sad pick-up lines, TV shows, hairstyles and clothing.

If we are trying to convince people that college students are thoughtless, all we'd really have to do is show them a copy of the Fourum.

The people on this campus are better than the synopsis of opinions displayed in the Fourum. Besides the low-quality content of the remarks, anonymous comments appear to be from weak individuals who won't stand behind their sarcasm.

I made that mistake once. I displayed my ignorant and snippy side to the entire campus. I don't think I'll be calling into the Fourum anytime soon.

If I really wanted to make a statement, I'd write a letter to the editor. I'd put my name behind my opinion. I would have thought about what I'd said and how it could be interpreted.

Better still, people who really think they have something to say can apply to be a Collegian columnist. Put your name, face, major and e-mail address behind your opinions.

Respected professor, mentor leaves great legacy of lessons

Editor,

K-State has suffered a great loss. Dr. Robert Poresky, an associate professor in the School of Human Development and Family Studies, died Nov. 13. His death affected me immensely, and I am writing this letter on behalf of all Poresky's students.

Poresky was a talented social science researcher and a respected teacher. While these things are important and the lifeblood of a university, his talent and service to K-State shined brightest as a mentor.

A mentor can be defined as "somebody, usually older and more experienced, who provides advice and support to, and watches over and fosters the progress of, a younger, less experienced person." Poresky, or "Dr. P" as many graduate students affectionately called him, fit this definition perfectly.

As a mentor, Poresky's most valuable gift to me was confidence. He instilled this confidence by using my complete graduate school experience as inspiration for his lessons. He found the balance of providing advice and allowing me to explore and learn on my own, usually anticipating my questions and challenges before I recognized them.

This taught me to rely on myself. He insisted on matching me with projects that met my interests and personalities, teaching me to celebrate my individuality. He also embraced my teaching style, even when it differed from his own, respecting it and encouraging me to respect it as well — teaching me to embrace the differences of others. All of these lessons gave me confidence to know that I can do it and do it well, while positively impacting others.

I learned much about my field, researching, teaching and mentoring from Poresky. I also learned something about legacies. I believe Poresky's legacy is a wonderful gift, which each of us must bestow in his honor upon other young students. Although Poresky no longer is at K-State, his example will always live on within his students and all those we touch. I will never rely on a written definition again — Dr. P will be the meaning of mentor for me.

God Bless You, Dr. Poresky.

Local airport's $30 million expansion to accommodate Fort Riley

BY TREVOR BURGESS
Kansas State Collegian

Manhattan Regional Airport might be going through some changes in the near future to better accommodate Fort Riley, one of the U.S. Army's prime maneuver posts.

Jim Ryun, R-Kan., announced Nov. 8 the inclusion of $240,000 in federal assistance for apron expansion at the Manhattan Regional Airport.

Fort Riley is beginning to use the Manhattan airport for rapid deployments when needed. The C-17A, which is one of two types of aircraft used for tank and Bradley airlift, will be the largest plane to be accommodated by the larger apron, which will be expanded near the passenger terminal.

Ryun said he is very happy to be a part of this expansion.

"Not only is the Manhattan airport important for commercial air travel, it serves as a strategic power projection platform for the U.S. Army," Ryun said. "In this time of war, it is more important than ever to see that the needs of Fort Riley and the surrounding areas are being met. I'm pleased to be able to help make this important endeavor a reality."

Ken Black, airport director, said this definitely would help out, but it is only a partial expansion of the apron.

"This expansion to the apron is about one-fourth of what we hope to eventually expand to in terms of apron space," he said.

Black also said this is only one step in a large expansion. Manhattan Regional Airport is expecting.

"The major expansion is the lengthening of the primary runway from 7,000 feet to 11,000 feet in length."

This is about the same size as a major airport such as Kansas City International, Black said.

Manhattan Regional Airport also wants to expand the shorter runway so that its commuter airline has an alternative runway to use.

"There's a phase of the expansion that involves the shorter runway and our desire to lengthen that runway to 5,000 feet in length," Black said.

The total expansion is expected to cost around $30 million, and Black said the funding would come from various areas.

"We think the money will also have to come from the Department of Defense because the purpose behind this expansion is to better support Fort Riley and its deployment," Black said.

The legislation for the apron expansion still must be signed into law by the president.

However, Black said he expects the funds to be available in the near future.

"It's been passed in both houses of Congress, and it's all up to the president for signature. So for all practical purposes, it's a done deal."

Powell sticking to Mid East peace plan

BY EUN-KYUNG KIM
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Plans for the creation of a Palestinian state cannot begin to take shape until Middle East violence is quelled, Secretary of State Colin Powell said Sunday, a day before a much-anticipated speech on the region.

"A new plan coming in from the flank isn't what's going to do it. It's both sides working together, finding ways to talk to each other, so that we can get a real cease-fire in place," Powell said on Fox News Sunday.

Powell, who was to deliver a speech Monday at the University of Louisville, said it would not offer any new information on U.S. policy in the Middle East.

"People keep asking for a new plan. We have a plan. It's a solid plan. It's called the Mitchell Committee Report," he said, referring to a plan that calls for a cooling-off period and other confidence-building measures before any settlement talks could begin.

In Israel, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon refused Sunday to soften demands for that violence-free period — one full week — before resuming peace talks. Earlier, a bomb had gone off near the King David hotel in Jerusalem while authorities tried to defuse it. No one was hurt by the bomb, which Israeli police said apparently was planted by Palestinians.

Powell said Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat must play a critical role in reducing tension in the conflict. "He needs to make 100 percent effort to end all the violence. And we need to see results that reflect that 100 percent effort."

Sharon has charged that Arafat has failed to move against violent militants. He urged European nations Sunday to stop giving money to Arafat's government.

In his speech, Powell is unlikely to try to deal with the future of Jerusalem, which Arafat envisions as the capital of a Palestinian state. Powell also is bound to insist again that Arafat curb attacks on Israel as an inducement to Israeli concessions.

Both Powell and President Bush have endorsed a Palestinian state. But they have not given any indication of how much pressure the administration might apply to Israel except to say it is obliged under U.N. Security Council resolutions to give land for peace.

"Palestine is simply a term for a state that might exist for the Palestinian people," Bush's national security adviser, Condoleezza Rice, said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"What the president was doing was to lay out a vision of where we might be, should we be able to encourage the parties to get back into a process that leads to a permanent peace."

Rice said that vision also includes the right for our good friend Israel to exist safely within its borders, where terrorism has been wiped out as a factor in the Middle East.

One of the countries the United States considers a state sponsor of terrorism is Syria because of its support for militant Palestinian groups.

But Powell said U.S. officials recently have had some rather direct conversations with the Syrians, who have indicated they want to improve relations with the United States.

Anthrax-free Senate buildings reopen; Hart office building to remain closed

The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Two of the Senate office buildings that were closed for anthrax testing are set to reopen for business, but a third building will remain shut, officials said Sunday.

Li. Dan Nichols of the Capitol Police said the Dirksen and Russell buildings would reopen at 8 a.m. today. The Hart Senate Office Building, shut last month when an anthrax-tainted letter was found in the office of Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., will remain closed.

The Dirksen and Russell buildings were closed Saturday after a letter mailed to Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., was discovered in the 280 barrels of mail quarantined after the contaminated Daschle letter was opened.

Nichols said the letter to Leahy was being analyzed at the Army's Fort Detrick in Maryland. Test results were not expected for several days, he said.

It was unclear whether the letter addressed to Leahy ever reached his office, said the senator's chief of staff, Luke Albee.

The envelopes addressed to Daschle and Leahy were similar, except for the name and address. They had block printing with a slight slant to the right, an Oct. 9 postmark from Trenton, N.J.; and the same, nonexistent school listed as the return address.

The FBI said all congressional mail set aside after discovery of the Daschle letter has been inspected, and the Leahy letter

February and their exposure in November."

Through her contact with employees and students on other floors in Waters, she said she has heard complaints of headaches and vomiting since the building's exposure.

"I have heard of GTAs and faculty members from the second and third floor getting sick," she said. "The custodial staff also had some illnesses. They complained of eye problems and scratchy throat."

Galitzer said he contacted the PPG Paint Company, the manufacturer. Company representatives said the chemicals should be gone within eight hours after job completion.

Still, he said he ordered test kits to see if there are any remnants of the substances left. He plans to begin testing once the kits arrive in the mail, he said, which should be Monday.

Sonny Ramaswamy, head of the Department of Entomology, said nine labs have been renovated in the past three years that underwent similar paintwork to Waters 27.

"I don't know what happened this time compared to the last times," Ramaswamy said. "Different people? Different methods? I don't know. The only common thing is that they all had metal cabinets. We have had no problem with the other nine, unless no one told me about it."

He said the nail polish remover-type smell was similar in all other renovation work, and the department never received any complaints.

During the days of the paintwork, he said, people working in the basement conducting research near the vicinity of Waters 27 noticed the smell, but did not experience any of Richter's symptoms.

"I told them if they had any problems, then they needed to go to the emergency room," he said. "People were more concerned their bugs were going to die."

"Some people are more sensitive than other people, though. What I am hoping is no one has gotten hurt from what we have done in Entomology."

MILITARY

She also left open the possibility that Iraq could become a target in Bush's war on terrorism.

"We do not need the events of Sept. 11 to tell us that this is a very dangerous man who is a threat to his own people, a threat to the region and a threat to us because he is determined to acquire weapons of mass destruction," she said.

Powell spoke encouragingly of the prospects for convening a meeting, under U.N. sponsorship, between the northern alliance of opposition groups and other factions to form a new power-sharing government in Afghanistan.

"The purpose of the meeting would be to bring together a number of leaders representing different parts of Afghanistan, different ethnicities, different tribes, and see if we can get an interim government in place and then stand up a broader government over time," Powell said.

Sen. Trent Lott, the Senate Republican leader, said on "Fox News Sunday" that the United States should not focus too hard on the political issues so long as the military campaign was not finished.

"I don't think we ought to be obsessed with, you know, the next government," Lott said. "We ought to be obsessed with getting the people that have been killing people all over the world ... I think the American people want us to go forth and do the deed."

was the only suspicious piece.

No congressional staff member or lawmaker has contracted anthrax, and business for the most part has returned to normal on Capitol Hill despite the introduction of National Guard troops this weekend to help overburdened Capitol Police officers.

Four people have died from anthrax: two Washington postal workers, a hospital worker in New York and a photo editor in Florida.

Leahy's spokesman, David Carle, said his office decided on its own Oct. 12 to set aside all unopened mail after an anthrax-contaminated letter was sent to NBC News anchor Tom Brokaw.

Congress is on its Thanksgiving recess this week.

"He was interested in helping us. He was a sound thinker and helped us to see the big picture and the variety of factors that come with the issue."

Rose Ditto, graduate student in lifespan and human ecology, will be a speaker at a memorial service at 10 a.m. Nov. 27 at All Faiths Chapel. The Memorial Service is open to everyone.

She said Poresky was a big supporter of non-traditional students.

"He always encouraged me, and he was always optimistic," Ditto said.

"He was a good researcher who was delighted in bringing that out in his students."

Ditto said Poresky was helping her put the final touches on her dissertation the day he died.

"He wasn't feeling well, and it was hard for him to breathe, but he still wanted to help me," she said.

"That takes a lot of drive, but he did what he loved to do, even on the day he died."

Movie captures essence of Rowling's popular 1st book

BY JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

Sometimes you can't say the book was better.

Every now and then, a movie comes along for the holiday season that has more to it than just the hype. Despite the onslaught of merchandising and money-grubbing that comes along with the first Harry Potter movie, this is a film that truly is magical.

The real suspension of disbelief with "Harry Potter and the Sorcerer's Stone" is not that a child could one day discover he or she actually is a wizard who can use magic and fly on a broom. It is that money-hungry movie executives could take a beloved fantasy world from a set of children's books and faithfully recreate it onscreen.

For a second forget that this is yet another example of Hollywood exploiting a genuinely good story for big box office numbers. Forget that

J.K. Rowling has become every bit as commercial as John Grisham. Even forget that Chris Columbus, the man who milked the holiday market for all it was worth with "Home Alone," is in the director's seat. Just suspend disbelief because this really is a good movie.

The truth is, "Harry Potter and the Sorcerer's Stone" is an enchantingly good movie that entire families actually can enjoy.

"Harry Potter and the Sorcerer's Stone" is the first book in the series by J.K. Rowling. It details the adventures of the 11-year-old Harry as he is rescued from his neglectful extended family and introduced to a magical world where he finds that he actually is famous and possesses magical powers.

For those acquainted with the continuing Harry Potter book series, the movie remains painstakingly true to the first book. All of the characters are intact, and the storyline is nearly untouched. You've got to have respect for the producers taking the risk of keeping the movie well over two hours long instead of cutting it down to the hour- and-a-half attention span of the target audience.

This is not a movie based on the Harry Potter book. This is an actual movie version of the book.

For the uninitiated, the movie might seem a little long, but it still is enjoyable. The special effects that bring the book to life are enough to impress any audience. In one of the more memorable scenes in the movie, a break-neck game of the wizard sport of Quidditch is impressively made real with players speeding around 50 feet in the air on brooms.

With the second movie on the way next year, a high standard has been set with this impressive piece of work. Half the fun for fans of the book will be seeing the character they have only read about. The young Daniel Radcliffe fleshes out Harry to a T, with his friends being equally accurate.

A script such as this also allows great opportunities for character acting, and it is an opportunity taken advantage of by the likes of Alan Rickman ("Dagma") as Professor Snape, and the nearly unknown David Bradley IV as Caretaker Filch.

The entire movie is impressively recreated from the book with only a few details left out. For Harry Potter fanatics or anyone else who wants to see a fun movie, this is the film to see.

MOVIE REVIEW BY JJ DUNCAN

Movie plot high on humor, low on originality

BY CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

Take a bit of "Friday" and "Next Friday," add a dash of "Car Wash" and you've got "The Wash."

Sean (Dr. Dre) is at the center of the plot of this movie, directed by D.J. Pooh. He is trying to scrape together rent money, so he and his roommate, Dee Loc (Snoop Dogg) get a job at a local car wash.

Sean and Dee Loc soon find that the job is anything but ordinary when they have to deal with the gun-toting owner (George Wallace) who is kidnapped, as well as harassing phone calls from a disgruntled employee.

The humor in this movie will keep audiences rolling in the aisles throughout its entire run. Dr. Dre and Snoop Dogg play extremely well off each other, and their chemistry is amazing. "The Wash" thrives on one-liners and physical comedy, and the two pull it off with ease. The pairing of Dr. Dre and Snoop Dogg is perfect, and they make the characters likable.

The contrived plot, however, has been done before in movies such as "Friday" (which was written by D.J. Pooh). It is very obvious that this movie borrowed several elements from the 1976 classic "Car Wash," but luckily, the humor takes the focus off of this nicely.

Adding to a tired plot is the fact that the ending is so abrupt, leaving the audience sitting in awe and asking,

"Was that really it?" It's unfortunate that the back-to-back laughs culminate in a confusing conclusion. At least in "Friday" and "Next Friday," the plot has some type of closure, if only simply bad.

While the humor seemingly never will get old, the plot needs some tuneup work. D.J. Pooh merely is trying to revive the popularity of "Friday," and while some aspects of it work, cloning the same situations does not.

Perhaps he should accept the two as separate movies and move on to new material.

Rob Zombie CD continues tradition of scary sound

BY JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

Maybe "The Sinister Urge" should be called "Hellbilly Deluxe 2."

Tackling horrifically campy themes like necrophilia, zombies and dead girls once again, Rob Zombie might write songs that repeat past themes, but it's so much fun to listen to.

No one makes horror movie vocals and loud guitars sound as good as Rob Zombie.

Listening to his unique brand of scary music is like being stuck in a fast-paced, gore-filled sci-fi horror movie with a bad ending for 40 mind-ripping minutes.

The fuzzed up vocals, razor sharp guitars, mixed with electronic sounds, horror movie samples and spooky sounds are what make Rob Zombie the monster he is. He borrows what he wants from rock, industrial, electronica and old movies and comes out with an album that shows kids how it should really be done.

Still, it can't be ignored that "The Sinister Urge" is nearly identical to "Hellbilly Deluxe" in sound, how the album lineup is handled, and song titling. Even the line art looks a lot like the album's predecessor. Instead of "Dragula" you have "Demon Speeding," instead of "Living Dead Girl" you have "Dead Girl Superstar." You get the point.

However, a few differences show, which prove Zombie is getting better at what he does. "Hellbilly" hands-down had better single material than the new album, but "The Sinister Urge" is surprisingly easier to listen to. The album is more tightly cut without the time-wasting interludes or filler songs that bogged down "Hellbilly."

Where "Hellbilly" had about four really strong songs, "The Sinister Urge" has 11 non-stop tracks that don't require you ever to hit the search button. Not to mention that this album hardly even needs the dance mixes that undoubtedly will be released. The music often is club-ready on its own.

"Go To California" is just one tack that's ready to be spun on black vinyl right alongside any hard dance music.

The first single, "Feel So Numb," isn't even the best track on the album. Try on the ultra-hard "Scum of the Earth" or the spooky "House of 1,000 Corpses," and you'll find the album is much more balanced than Zombie's previous efforts. The two songs are the last tracks, showing that the back-end of this album is much stronger than the "Hellbilly" album's ending.

"House of 1,000 Corpses" takes you right into Zombie's world as he sings "She got a corpse under her bed / She had her fun but now he's dead / Her Momma said come feed desire / Her brother said 'Hey, throw him on the fire.'"

If you have any White Zombie or Rob Zombie albums, this is a release worth picking up. "The Sinister Urge" shows that Rob Zombie doesn't plan to slow down any time soon.

Volleyball squad wins home finale

BY SEAN PURCELL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State players and coaches knew the final regular season match at home would test the emotions and patience of the team.

And as No. 13 Texas A&M dug volleyball after volleyball, slowly making a comeback, the Wildcats searched for a way to persevere and win just one more game.

"We always have a philosophy that we have to throw our hearts out on the court and give every last shred of what we have," senior Liz Wegner said. "If we do that, we have no shame knowing we gave everything. We did that out there, and it worked."

Before the sixth largest crowd ever to watch a volleyball match in Ahearn Field House (4,889), the No. 22 Wildcats showed enough heart and determination to beat the Aggies in five sets (33-31, 31-29, 18-30, 26-30, 15-10). K-State (18-7, 14-5) jumped on Texas A&M (21-5, 14-4) from the opening serve, but the Aggies roared back to send the match to a fifth game. Head coach Suzie Fritz said the team dug deep when it counted.

"This team has tremendous courage and composure," Fritz said. "I like our chances in big matches because of that."

In game one, the Wildcats sizzled on .475 hitting. Junior Jennifer Pollard scored nine kills to lead the Cats in the win. Wegner added seven more kills as K-State outlasted the Aggies in a back and forth game.

The Wildcats continued to dominate early as defense proved the difference in the second game. K-State posted two of its nine blocks toward the end of the game to put the Aggies away before heading to the locker room at the break. Along with senior Lisa Mimick, Wegner tallied five kills, including the set's final two points to finish off Texas A&M, 31-29.

Momentum shifted dramatically in games three and four, though, as a combination of Wildcat errors and strong hitting from the Aggies allowed Texas A&M to tie the match with two straight wins. The Cats were held to just .047 hitting, while the Aggies scored 11 more kills than K-State to take game three. Texas A&M continued to frustrate the Cats in game four, tallying 28 digs, sending the match a deciding final set.

"They picked up their game a little, and we let down a little as well," Mimick said. "We missed some big serves at big times, so that is something we have to work on in order to be a better volleyball team."

That Wildcat team showed up in game five. Knotted up at 8-8, K-State put the match away with a run of five consecutive points that seemed to take the wind out of the Aggies' sails for good. Pollard helped put away Texas A&M, tallying five of the Cats' 10 kills in the final set.

With the win, the Cats extended their season-long winning streak to six matches. Wegner said the Cats knew they could outplay Texas A&M if they stuck to their style of volleyball. A victory like this gives the team that much more momentum going into postseason play, she said.

"I believe we are a better ball team than they are. It was just a matter of playing our game," Wegner said. "We got away from that a little in games three and four, but we pulled it together when it counted."

Men's team hangs on to late lead; defeats Troy State in home opener

BY DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

It might be a stretch to say K-State has reversed its late-game misfortunes of a year ago based on one game, but the Wildcats' start to the 2000-01 season could be a step.

After blowing a seven-point advantage with 1:51 to play in the purple's exhibition opener against Global Sports, falling 58-57, questions were raised whether preserving a lead would be a problem again for the Cats.

But in Friday night's season-opener — when it counted in the win/loss column — K-State appeared to refute those very concerns.

The Wildcats (1-0) led by five with 3:13 to play and held on for a 64-60 victory over Troy State (0-1), winning their eighth straight home-opener before 6,216 at Bramlage Coliseum.

The Trojans had back-to-back three-shot possessions with less than two minutes to play, but failed to score, and K-State hit three of four free throws in the game's closing seconds despite shooting a 33 percent from the line in the first half.

"I think it was really big. Last year, that was kind of our Achilles heel, losing those close games," senior Matt Siebrandt said. "But I think we set the tone with this first game."

Siebrandt made two of those clutch free throws with 0:16.9 left to keep the lead at five, and true freshman Nick Williams hit the front end of his two attempts with just less than five seconds to seal it.

"Walking to the line, I wanted to make the first one to make it a two-bucket game," Williams said, "and the second one I wanted to miss just so they had to push the ball up the floor and take a couple seconds off the clock. That's what I want to say. It was a deliberate miss."

Evan Semón/Collegian

But Friday's contest didn't look to go down to the wire based on the first 4:40 of the game. K-State jumped out to an 11-2 lead, but he Trojans would surge a comeback, and Lovell Craig's tip-in as time expired would give Troy State a 34-32 lead heading into the locker room.

Siebrandt said the team knew what it had to do after the intermission.

"We had to come out with some urgency," he said. "In your season opener at home, you don't want to lose, so we had to come out and show some intensity at the beginning of the half and try to get back in the game."

The Cats did, taking a three-point lead in the first five minutes, but the Trojans wouldn't die, expending a 9-0 run to claim their biggest lead of the game at six, 47-41.

K-State would best that with a 10-0 run, though, to take the lead for good.

Head coach Jim Wooldridge was pleased with the win, but said the team must improve offensively at moving the ball into scoring areas, which caused the majority of K-State's 22 turnovers. The Trojans also used 21 offensive rebounds to score 15 second-chance points.

Despite those struggles, Wooldridge said one thing proved to be the equalizer in the victory.

"I've got to be honest with you, I think our guys just gutted it out," he said. "Every team needs to taste it. We needed a win. I thought we played hard and it's good that they could come out with the fruits of a win."

on her starting lineup:

Kari Hanson

21

Freshman, 5-8 Guard
"Kari has done a nice job of stabilizing our offense and our defense at this point in time. If we're in a halfcourt game where we need more control and more predictability, Kari Hanson gives us that stability, and so does Chelsea Dominico."

Laurie Koehn

10

Freshman, 5-8 Guard
"What was particularly impressive (at Georgia Tech) was not her ability to make shots, but her ability to take and finish them."

Megan Mahoney

34

Freshman, 6-0 Forward
"To see one of our perimeter players get to the rim and finish the shot was literally a dream come true, and it's exactly why we brought Megan Mahoney into the program for, and she stepped up and did her job."

Kendra Wecker

Freshman, 5-11 Forward
"Her strength and versatility, combined with her ability to handle the basketball, and to shoot jump shots and the three combine to make her one of the nation's best coming out of high school."

Nicole Ohlde

Sophomore, 6-4 Forward
"I'm very hard on Nicole Ohlde every day of practice because she is such a phenomenal talent and worker. What I like in Nicole is that she gives me great confidence when she steps on the floor that she's going to work hard, that she's going to produce within the flow of the game."

THE FABULOUS FIVE

K-State women's basketball head coach Deb Patterson began her sixth season with the Wildcats on Friday night in Atlanta, Ga., with a 74-70 upset over Georgia Tech. The Cats' home opener is tonight at 7 p.m. in Bramlage Coliseum against the IUPUI Jaguars.

Wildcats to surprise this season

Women's basketball might not be the first thing that pops in your head when you hear the word "success."

With K-State's recent accomplishments in football, volleyball, cross country and even equestrian, very little noise has come out of head coach Deb Patterson's camp in the last couple of years.

In fact, you might have not even known that K-State has a women's basketball team at all. But by the end of this season, you will.

More than that, I'm willing to bet that names such as Megan Mahoney, Kendra Wecker and Laurie Koehn will be on the tip of your tongue by the end of the school year.

Why, you ask?

Patterson has put together arguably the best incoming basketball class in school history — men's or women's — this season, and they've already raised some eyebrows.

With Friday's 74-70 upset of Georgia Tech, the Cats already have exceeded expectations, and this group of rising stars is hungry for more.

As the Cats open up the home portion of their schedule tonight at 7 tonight with a game against IUPUI at Bramlage Coliseum, remember that this team has only played a total of three games under Patterson.

Still, the starting lineup that includes four freshmen and a sophomore has been playing like a group of seasoned veterans since they handed the Houston Jaguars an embarrassing 83-53 loss Nov. 7 to open up the exhibition slate.

Just four days later, K-State spanked Spartak Moscow by 38, and on Friday they showed why Patterson is giddier than a kid in a candy store by giving the Yellow Jackets a glimpse of what's to come this season.

Patterson's young guns hardly are crawling out of their diapers, but surely the Cat coach couldn't have predicted that Mahoney, Wecker and Koehn could make such an immediate impact on her team — or could she?

Wecker came out of the gates on fire in the preseason, registering double-doubles in both of the exhibition contests, and scoring 16 Friday night.

Koehn broke out of her exhibition slump by connecting on 7-of-10 from behind the arc to lead all scorers Friday, and Mahoney continued to show the kind of hustle that had Wildcat fans on their feet during K-State's first two games.

But tonight is where it all starts for real. Sure, the Cats are 1-0 and riding high after an upset win, but where this year's team will get its spark is from a Bramlage Coliseum crowd that is ready to raise the roof against IUPUI tonight.

K-State finished 7-6 at home last season, with a lot less talent. Now is the time for Cat fans to get behind an exciting group of women who have a lot to prove.

You, the fan, should demand success from this team. In much the same way, Patterson is demanding fan support from you. K-State's largest crowd last season was 6,217 fans, against Nebraska, on Feb. 17.

On Friday night, 6,216 fans packed Bramlage to watch the Wildcat men's team squeak by Troy State. The Cat women averaged 3,424 per game last season over 13 games, and they should have more than 4,000 on hand tonight at Bramlage.

It's your chance to be part of something big this season.

The football team hopefully will be spending Christmas in Shreveport, La., the volleyball team should be making some noise in the NCAA tournament this winter, but this women's basketball team has the potential to finish ahead of them all.

My prediction for this year's team is 20-10 heading into the Big 12 Tournament on March 5. The Cats were picked to finish in the bottom half of the conference in most preseason polls, but I'm telling you right now that this team will finish near the top.

Go to Bramlage tonight. Support the Cats as Patterson's players surprise team after team this season, and then afterwards e-mail me and let me know how right I was.

Cats see 1st home action tonight

BY MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Walking on campus, the starting lineup for K-State's women's basketball team could be easily mistaken for a visiting group of high school seniors.

Every one of the starters is a teen-ager. Four of the five have spent less than four months in Manhattan. Going to Aggieville at night, is out of the question.

Yet, at Georgia Tech on Friday, K-State defeated a Yellow Jacket team whose starters were two years older than the Cats. Tech had even received seven votes in the USA Today/ESPN Coaches Poll, but K-State won the game, 74-70.

"It really demonstrated the toughness, competitiveness and fight that's in this group," head coach Deb Patterson said. "These young players are determined not to back down."

But the Cats still showed their age at times.

"To be perfectly honest, in the first 15 minutes of the game, we were a very tight and nervous team," Patterson said. "What's impressive is how we managed the game despite being nervous."

Indeed, K-State's starters — freshmen Kendra Wecker, Megan Mahoney, Kari Hanson and Laurie Koehn, and sophomore Nicole Ohlde — accounted for all but seven of the Cats' 74 points. Koehn led the way with 27 points.

Perhaps most impressive about Koehn's performance was that it came after a year of inactivity due to injury.

"Laurie played a phenomenal basketball game," Patterson said. "It was unthinkable that she could come into her first Division I game and play the way she did after having a year off."

Koehn also helped seal the victory for K-State by hitting a three-pointer and four free throws in the final minute and a half of the game.

"I don't think that I've seen in the last three or four years a bigger shot than the one she hit at the end of the game," Patterson said. "It was a contested 22-foot shot with, I think, 1:18 on the clock."

Koehn was more reserved in assessing her performance.

"There's still so much for me to work on," she said.

"Every shot that I got was because somebody had a good pass or did something to set it up."

"We didn't play as well as we wanted to, but we got the win and that's what matters."

Koehn and K-State will not be able to enjoy that victory for long, though. The Cats will play IUPUI in their home opener at 7 tonight in Bramlage Coliseum.

The Jaguars (1-0) from Indianapolis could test K-State in its weaker areas, such as rebounding. Against Georgia Tech, the Cats got outrebounded 41-27, including 20-11 on offensive boards. IUPUI, however, grabbed a whopping 58 rebounds in its final exhibition game.

"We certainly will look to rebound at a higher level," Patterson said. "They're doing a nice job on the boards."

K-State should be able to take advantage of its quickness on defense. At Georgia Tech, the Cats stole the ball 13 times and caused 23 total turnovers. They also blocked six shots.

"They're streaky shooters from the three-point line, and we'll look to put some pressure on them and look to extend the floor on them," Patterson said. "They turned the ball over at a fairly high rate in their two exhibition games."

Snyder: Cats seek complete win after Louisiana Tech game

BY DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

It wasn't pretty, but at least it got the job done.

That was the message head coach Bill Snyder delivered to his players after K-State's 40-7 drubbing of Louisiana Tech on Saturday afternoon that kept the Cats' bowl hopes alive for at least another week.

"Time's running out, and it's time for us to put together a complete ballgame," Snyder said.

Fortunately, K-State (5-5, 2-5) didn't need a complete ballgame to get past the WAC-leading Bulldogs (6-4, 6-1) at KSU Stadium, as the Wildcats struggled in many aspects of their offense again.

Instead, it was K-State's defense that came up big one more time.

"It was a player's game, and they made great checks," defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said.

"They knew they had a challenge, and they stepped up. It was awesome."

Before the contest, it was the Bulldog offensive attack that garnered much of the pregame hype, ranking 11th in the country in total offense and fifth nationally in scoring. But it was the Cat defense that put up the most impressive numbers Saturday.

"I told our guys coming in, those guys are averaging almost 500 yards and 40 points a game," Bennett said. "They went up and down the field on everybody they've played, and it was just one of those days that if you were a golfer, you'd probably be about eight or nine under."

It was a score of a different kind that mattered most, though, as K-State held the Bulldogs to 175 total yards and seven points to inch one step closer to bowl eligibility, setting up what Snyder called a one-game season in a conference clash against Missouri at KSU Stadium on Saturday.

"It's a season all in itself," Snyder said. "People had talked all week about what we had to do for two ballgames, but this coming week's ballgame would not have mattered if we didn't succeed today."

"Today was a one-game season. That's the way we approached it. Now we go back, and we say we've got one more."

That approach must have been pretty powerful to overcome five costly Wildcat turnovers in the contest and a first half that saw K-State penetrate the Tech half of the field seven times only to come away with 10 points on offense before the break.

The difference Saturday, Snyder said, was the way his team responded after halftime.

"If you're gonna play this game, the message is 'keep playing,'" he said.

"When things go great, keep playing. When things go bad, keep playing. That's exactly what you do."

"You practice all week trying to do certain things. And if it doesn't go right for a while, you keep playing."

K-State seemed to make that its mission statement in the second half, scoring on nearly all of its opportunities to post a convincing win in front of 47,069 fans and two Mainstay Independence Bowl scouts.

Representatives Pesky Hill and Lindy Broderick were on hand to witness K-State's latest offensive breakdown, but the defense shored up a possible trip to Shreveport, La., on Dec. 27 by shutting down the Tech offense in the second half.

Despite producing a season-best 543 yards of total offense, Snyder said it was his defense's ability to shut down Bulldog quarterback Luke McCown that played the biggest part in the Cats' win.

"All it says is that our defense played so well against the pass on defense," Snyder said of his team's high offensive numbers. "It really doesn't say anything about our offense."

Instead, it was the offense's tendency to make mistakes that Snyder preferred to address after the game.

"Louisiana Tech's a good football team, but you're not going to beat teams in our conference turning the ball over like that. And we haven't learned that yet," he said. "They're silly turnovers — they absolutely are. I promised we'd get better at that, but we didn't. So I broke the promise."

"I'm tremendously concerned about the turnovers," he said. "The 500 or whatever yards it is — that's a different unit."

K-State now turns its attention toward a Missouri (4-5, 3-4) team that handed Baylor a 41-24 loss in Columbia, Mo., on Nov. 10, and has had an extra week to prepare for the Wildcats.

Part of the challenge that faces the team now, Snyder said, is understanding that the win over Tech means nothing without another one against the Tigers this weekend.

"It feels better than a loss," Snyder said, "but we've still got some work ahead of us. It all boils down to next week."

Lockett enjoys gratification in record receiving performance against Bulldogs

Kelly Glasscock/Collegian

K-State wide receiver Aaron Lockett hauls in a long pass from Eli Roberson during the Wildcats' 40-7 win over Louisiana Tech on Saturday in Manhattan. With this catch, Lockett earned a season-best 120 yards, giving him 2,400 receiving yards for his career.

BY LAURA BOYD
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's passing game found its niche Saturday against Louisiana Tech as senior wide receiver Aaron Lockett brought fans to their feet and set a few records along the way.

Lockett's diving catch off a 46-yard pass from quarterback Eli Roberson in the second quarter established a new confidence in a passing game that has had its share of struggles this season.

"He definitely put a lot of air under it, and that's something I've been asking him to do," Lockett said. "It gave me the opportunity to get my feet under the ball. I dove for it, kept my eyes on the ball, and it was something I came up with."

With that catch — the senior's third of the day — Lockett collected a season-best 120 yards, enough to put him at 2,400 receiving yards for his career, 57 short of Michael Smith, who ranks second on the list behind Aaron's brother, Kevin.

"It had been a disappointing season for him in different ways," head coach Bill Snyder said. "The most important thing is how he succeeded today."

But Lockett wasn't done with the record books yet.

His 120 receiving yards in the day tied him with Darnell McDonald for fourth on the all-time list for most 100-yard receiving games, with seven. Lockett said he always looks for the opportunity to play like he did against Louisiana Tech, and if nothing else, he can learn from the mistakes he made in the past.

"I know I have the experience and athletic ability, but it is just being able to use it," Lockett said.

Louisiana Tech was determined to stop the run, forcing K-State to re-establish its passing game, which had been dormant this year, giving Lockett the opportunity he needed.

"I think any time you're committing so many people to stopping a run, the pass is then going to be difficult to defend," Louisiana Tech head coach Jack Bicknell said.

Bicknell knew what his team was risking by neglecting Lockett.

"We were just trying to tackle him," Bicknell said. "He's a talented guy. Our only thought was just trying to tackle him. He's just a great player." Lockett took advantage of every opportunity, acquiring 250 all-purpose yards in Saturday's game.

That number was good enough for the eighth most in K-State history and is the most since Mike Lawrence gained 252 against Iowa State in 1996.

"When you put your mind to it and accomplish what you want, other things just come with it," Lockett said of the records.

Though Saturday's performance ended on a positive note, the reality that his career at K-State was coming to a close was becoming more of a reality for Lockett. The senior said he wants to make his last run at Wagner Field a memorable one Saturday.

"The last five years have gone by quicker than one day," Lockett said. "I know it is going to be an emotional time for all of us."

PRESSURE PLAYERS

K-State defense limits Louisiana Tech potent passing attack in victory

BY LAURA BOYD
Kansas State Collegian

Strong pressure and forced turnovers allowed K-State to obstruct one of the country's top-ranked offenses Saturday.

But even defensive coordinator Phil Bennett's unit couldn't keep Louisiana Tech scoreless, and early in the first quarter, the Bulldogs took a 7-0 lead over the Wildcats.

"Bennett believed we could do it, so we had a lot to prove after that first touchdown," junior cornerback Terence Newman said.

Bennett was not wavered by the touchdown and maintained his confidence in his defense.

"Terence had him covered," Bennett said of the touchdown. "He thought there was a sack, so he stopped. But the rest of the game, he was on."

With that, the Wildcats' defense made sure that was the last time the Bulldogs saw the end zone.

K-State retained its ninth place ranking in rushing defense Saturday by keeping Louisiana Tech to less than 50 rushing yards.

"Our kids were in tune to what we wanted to do," Bennett said.

"They knew they had a challenge, and they stepped up. It

Louisiana Tech's John Simon fumbles the ball as he is hit by K-State's Ben Leber (52) and Henry Bryant (90) during the second half of Saturday's game. The Cats won the game 40-7 and will need a win over Missouri on Saturday to qualify for a postseason bowl game.

was awesome."

Forcing three turnovers and a safety in Saturday's matchup once again showed the strength of K-State's defense.

"They are a passing team, so we had to step up our game," senior cornerback DeMarcus Faggins said. "As a cornerback, you know they are going to pass the ball. So I always have to be on my toes."

Coaches and players were excited about the team's play last weekend and look forward to next week's game against Missouri.

"Everyone is doing their part," senior free safety Jon McGraw said. "It feels nice to dominate."

McGraw said he also saw the vital role the defense had in making up for the offense's setbacks.

"Our offense has been unpredictable. So it is important for the defense to set the tone and be consistent," McGraw said. "We knew it was important that we didn't let them gain confidence from our turnovers."

Head coach Bill Snyder knew what the team was up against with the Bulldog offense and said he was pleased with the play of the Wildcat defense.

"Our defense played awfully well against their passing game," Snyder said. "This football team has played extremely well on defense over the course of time."

Snyder said he will be the first to admit time is running out. The team knows next weekend determines how the season will end. It all comes down to one game, and the Cats know they have to give it everything they've got.

"This is what sports is all about," McGraw said. "We get in tough positions and see how we react."

The Cats definitely are ready to turn their attention to this weekend's game and leave the past behind them, though, senior Ben Leber said.

"We knew after Nebraska, it was crunch time," he said. "We have to refocus and get back on Missouri."

Leber said he knows the tough position the team is in with the prospect of a bowl game bid on the line.

"Since I've been here, we have never missed a bowl game, and I don't plan on it now," Leber said.

With the determination this defense showed against Louisiana Tech and the momentum they plan to take into their matchup against the Tigers, these players have nothing but a win in their sights, McGraw said.

"We are mentally ready," he said. "Next week is huge, and we want to finish on the right note."

K-State will preserve bowl streak

K-State versus Missouri has been quite the bloodbath at KSU Stadium in recent years.

In the battle of Big 12 felines, the Cats have outscored the Tigers 137-11 in their last three tries at Wagner Field, and I got to witness one of those shellackings first-hand.

It was my freshman year at K-State, and the purple capped off its 10-1 regular season record with a 66-0 blowout of Mizzou.

Believe me, it was ugly.

Now, what did those three previous outings against the Tigers have in common?

K-State finished with 10 wins in each of those seasons, a top-10 national ranking and a bowl victory.

Well, the first two of those are out of the question this season, with the Cats at 5-5 and unranked, but the latter is a distinct possibility.

If they win Saturday.

As will be the talk of this week.

K-State must defeat Missouri to earn its sixth victory of the season and qualify for bowl eligibility.

Then, head coach Bill Snyder's past success can take care of itself.

K-State would go to a bowl game — there's no question about it.

No matter if eight Big 12 teams are bowl eligible or not, the Cats wouldn't be sitting at home come December.

And after they hand Missouri a convincing loss (not quite as bad as usual, but still convincing)

Saturday, the stage will be set — and most importantly, K-State's bowl streak will be preserved.

The seniors don't want to be known as the team that snapped Snyder's streak at eight, that's for sure.

But as to where the Cats will end up, that's beginning to come together.

The team might not be in a position to be picky, but as a sports writer planning to travel wherever the purple go, I can be.

Right now, the Independence Bowl on Dec. 27 is the most likely projection for K-State, pitting the Big 12's No. 6 versus a team from the SEC — probably LSU.

Since we beat Iowa State head-to-head this season, we should edge the Cyclones there, and plus, the Independence Bowl representatives were at KSU Stadium for Saturday's 40-7 win over La Tech.

Shreveport, La., doesn't sound like too bad a place to spend the holiday season, so I'm all for it.

Thank goodness it won't be the Galleryfurniture.com Bowl.

Houston, Texas, is a terrible, terrible city. It's like they have no zoning laws. You see a strip club next to a church and a liquor store across the street from an elementary school.

Come on. Give me a break.

I hope the Cats get a break this weekend. I don't think they'll need it, but a little luck on their side never hurts in the Big 12.

School board votes to close 2 schools

BY SARAH RICE

Kansas State Collegian

The Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 school board voted 7-0 to close Eugene Field and Bluemont elementary schools during its Nov. 20 meeting.

Board president Nancy Knopp said the school district has experienced a decline in enrollment for many years, creating a budget crisis.

"Since 1993, our district has lost 1,200 students," she said. "Next year, we could stand to lose 250 more. We have to save $2 million."

Knopp also said that by closing the elementary schools, the board could avoid cutting special programs that are crucial to the high school experience.

"Our buildings are underutilized. It's inequitable to students and teachers," Knopp said. "To not close schools would cause deep, deep closures to course offerings. Even with the closure of two schools, we will still have to make cuts."

The board, after several work sessions and community forums, focused its attention on the four downtown schools, which include Eugene Field, Theodore Roosevelt, Woodrow Wilson and Bluemont, knowing that one small school and one large school had to be closed.

Roosevelt Elementary was eliminated from the discussion because of the large number of students who walk to school and its close proximity to Eugene Field. The board members reached a consensus of closing Eugene Field because of its small number of students.

Although the special programs in each school were brought up by parents and teachers during the forums, Knopp said the board did not use programs as a decision factor.

"We are convinced that good things are happening in all our buildings," she said. "We are looking at the buildings themselves, not what is happening inside. In time, those programs that are worthwhile will continue to exist in a different form."

Board member Larry Weaver stressed the difficulty in reaching a decision that would satisfy the community and improve the current budget crisis.

"We are doing this because we have a dollar problem," he said. "We are doing this because we have to, but it doesn't feel good."

Coming into Tuesday night's meeting, board members knew they had to close Eugene Field. However, deciding between the closure of Bluemont and Woodrow Wilson provided more of a challenge.

"It would be much better if we found a big difference between the two," board member Joleen Hill said. "Woodrow Wilson has service on the main floor. It is more accessible to staff, students, paras and grandparents — the people who want to be part of the school."

Accessibility proved to be the saving factor for Woodrow Wilson. Even though Bluemont and Eugene Field will not house elementary school students, they will have alternative uses.

The board voted 7-0 to relocate Head Start, currently located on Kimball Avenue, to Eugene Field. The board also voted 7-0 to expand Manhattan Technical College to the current Head Start location. The future use of Bluemont will be decided at a later date.

In December, an entire redistricting will be drawn out, and students should know which school they will be attending by January, Knopp said.

holiday shopping COUNTDOWN

Shoppers urged to start buying early

BY EDIE HALL

Kansas State Collegian

The countdown has started — less than one month is left to finish shopping for the holidays.

For some, this means shopping is almost finished. For others, however, it means it's time to start.

According to the International Council of Shopping Centers, or ICSC, a majority of malls will extend their hours to accommodate holiday shopping.

Despite the fact that Manhattan Town Center doesn't extend its hours until early December, many people took advantage of the holiday weekend sales and started their Christmas shopping early.

Erine Poulson, sophomore in family studies, said she had already done some Christmas shopping.

"I've gotten things for my family and a couple of my friends," Poulson said. "It's easier for me to shop early because most of my family lives far enough away that I have to mail them their gifts. If I wait until the last minute, it's harder to get everything sent out and a lot more stressful."

However, some students wait until closer to Christmas to do their shopping.

"I usually wait a little longer to buy my presents," Susan Andersen, senior in family studies, said. "I work at the Cats' Den in the Union and usually work more hours in December because of holiday shopping, so I have more money later in the month than earlier to buy gifts with."

According to ICSC, the weekend after Thanksgiving accounted for 8.6 percent of shopping done for the 2000 holiday season. The week of Dec. 18 through Dec. 24 accounted for the largest share, 30.9 percent of shopping done for the 2000 holiday season. The statistics for the 1999 holiday season were similar.

Despite this trend of shopping later rather than earlier, some people urge customers to get their shopping done early.

"I would advise people to shop earlier rather than later," said Sara Jahansouz, sophomore in biology and employee at the K-State Place in Manhattan Town Center. "There are good bargains the weekend after Thanksgiving. It's also a good idea to buy gift certificates because the sales after Christmas will be even better."

Wal-Mart doors opened at 5 a.m. Friday. Shoppers crowded the store in search for the best bargains. Matt Stamey/Collegian

Video games top childrens' Christmas wish lists this season

BY SARAH BAHARI

Kansas State Collegian

Seven-year-old Sean Diesel knows a thing or two about video games. In fact, it's at the top of his Christmas wish list.

"I want games for my Nintendo and games for my Gameboy and my sister, and I want games for our computer," he said. "And I want a VCR for my bedroom."

Diesel isn't alone. The young Manhattan resident is asking for the same things as most of his friends — video games.

Troy Hock, assistant manager of KB Toys, said this is nothing unusual.

"Video games systems are huge this year," he said. "Just like last year."

Microsoft will introduce the Xbox, and Nintendo will come out with Gamecube this season.

Both are expected to be big sellers, Hock said.

This year is a little different, though, said Andrew McCormack, department manager for Kmart. There isn't one hot item as there has been in the past, like Tickle Me Elmo, Furbie and Pokemon.

"There won't be as many disappointed customers," he said. "There are more selections for our customers."

Some of the other popular items include Bionicles, a LEGO product; Rumble Robots, small battery-operated robots that act out different commands when activated with cards; the Nutcracker Barbie; and the What's my Face Doll, which comes without a face and children can paint one on.

Wal-Mart department manager Debra Dortch said the classics still are selling. "Power Rangers and Transformers are still big," she said. "Dolls are still big. Pogo sticks are, too, which is kind of a change."

Some violent toys aren't selling well this year, McCormack said, most likely because of Sept. 11. Few families are buying guns or anything with violent pictures on them.

Kmart even took a few items off the shelves because they showed pictures of people being blown up.

Sept. 11 also has affected local sales, McCormack said. People actually have been buying more.

"People are looking for ways to cheer themselves up," he said. "One way to do that is to keep the kids happy."

Company clones human embryo

BY JEFF DONN

Associated Press Writer

BOSTON — A research company reported Sunday it had cloned the first human embryo, a development it said was aimed at producing genetically matched replacement cells for patients with a wide range of diseases.

But the news from Advanced Cell Technology of Worcester, Mass., drew protests from religious and political leaders who saw it as a step toward cloning human beings.

Several states, including California, have banned human cloning, and Congress is considering such a ban. But company officials insisted their work is the first step in providing hope for people with spinal injuries, heart disease and other ailments.

"These are exciting preliminary results," said Dr. Robert P. Lanza, one of the researchers at Advanced Cell Technology. "This work sets the stage for human therapeutic cloning as a potentially limitless source of immune-compatible cells for tissue engineering and transplantation medicine."

Lanza and the company's top executive Michael West said they had no interest in transplanting such early embryos into a woman's womb to give birth to a cloned human being, nor was it clear that their embryo would be capable of that.

But the Washington D.C.-based National Right to Life Committee wasted little time Sunday attacking the announcement.

"This corporation is creating human embryos for the sole purpose of killing them and harvesting their cells," the group's legislative director Douglas Johnson said. "Unless Congress acts quickly, this corporation and others will be opening human embryo farms."

And a critic of the company who used to sit on ACT's ethics board said Advanced Cell's announcement was premature and would serve to encourage reaction against cloning.

Glenn McGee, a University of Pennsylvania bioethicist who resigned from Advanced Cell Technology's ethics advisory board, called the announcement "nothing but hype." He said the company's report lacks any significant details, including which cells company scientists actually grew from the cloned embryo. The paper doesn't say if Advanced Cell was able to derive any human embryonic stem cells from its cloning effort.

In findings published Sunday by the online journal, e-biomed: The Journal of Regenerative Medicine, and also described online in Scientific American, the scientists said they had grown a six-cell human embryo.

They said they created the early embryo by injecting a very small cell with its genetic material into a woman's donated egg. In such cloning, the injected DNA often comes from a skin cell, but the researchers this time used a cumulus cell, which nurtures a developing egg.

This technique could produce replacement cells only for a woman of childbearing age.

Gas price levels expected to be lower this winter

LAWRENCE — Although winter officially begins at 1:21 a.m. Dec. 21, forecasters say winter weather might hit the state much sooner — possibly within 10 days.

The good news is that suppliers of natural and propane gas say they have plentiful supplies this year, and consumers should not suffer the high prices they faced last winter.

A front moving into Kansas from the northwest should drop temperatures into the mid-20s early Tuesday and Wednesday, said Mike Akulow, meteorologist with the National Weather Service in Topeka. High temperatures are expected to be in the low to mid-40s.

"If this pattern persists, then I think we could see our first snow in 10 days," Akulow said.

Temperatures throughout much of November have been from 10 to 15 degrees above normal, the weather service said, and that has helped the nation's supply of propane and natural gas remain well-stocked.

"We don't expect the big price spikes of last year," said Justin Holstin, executive vice president of the Propane Marketers Association of Kansas.

The average price of natural gas for 2001-2002 in the Midwest is expected to be $6.69 per thousand cubic feet, according to the information center. It says the actual average price last winter was $9.49 per thousand cubic feet.

Anthrax bacteria in letter enough to kill 100,000

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Sen. Patrick Leahy says there was enough anthrax in the letter sent to his office to kill more than 100,000 people.

The letter to the Vermont Democrat was discovered Nov. 16 in a batch of unopened mail sent to Capitol Hill and quarantined since the discovery of an anthrax-contaminated letter to Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., on Oct. 15.

"We still haven't got the letter open," Leahy said Sunday on NBC's "Meet the Press." "It is so powerful that they're having difficulty figuring out how best to open it and preserve the evidence."

An FBI microbiologist said last week that there were billions of spores inside the letter, which was taped around the edges.

"You could feel the powder inside," the microbiologist told reporters.

Daschle, speaking a day after a memorial service for a 94-year-old Connecticut woman who died from inhalation anthrax, said Americans should be careful opening their mail.

Bush pushing economic plan as Senate reconvenes

WASHINGTON, D.C. — With Congress returning this week, top Bush administration officials prodded the Democrat-controlled Senate on Sunday to act on a stimulus proposal and defended the president's emphasis on corporate tax cuts as a cure for the limping economy.

The Senate's top Democrat said he was troubled by the idea of corporate tax cuts at a time when companies are laying off workers.

Police unravel students' plan to terrorize school

NEW BEDFORD, Mass. — Police used bomb-sniffing dogs Sunday to search a high school where three teenagers allegedly planned to use explosives and guns to kill fellow students.

The daylong search of the sprawling 3,300-student New Bedford High School by 38 police officers and five bomb-sniffing dogs yielded no new evidence of the alleged plot, police Lt. Richard Spirles said.

Police, school officials and faculty members gathered Sunday morning at the school to discuss the events and to confirm the school would open Monday.

Eric McKeehan, 17, and two juveniles who allegedly modeled themselves after the two students who carried out the Columbine High School massacre in Colorado were scheduled for arraignment Monday on charges that include conspiracy to murder.

Kansas State Poultry Judging Team

The Kansas State Poultry Judging Team garnered top honors at the 36th annual National Collegiate Poultry Judging Contest in Arkansas on Nov. 5-6.

The team included four K-State students including Allegra Toll and Beth Coslett, seniors in animal science and industry; Carrie Edmonds, junior in animal science and industry; and Allen Baldridge, sophomore in animal science and industry.

"The thing that amazes me is that K-State is such a beef and livestock school, that other universities didn't expect us to do so well," Toll said. "I think the fact that we did so well in the poultry competition is just amazing."

The team judged live birds and products as part of the contest, which featured 10 teams from various universities. The four also won first in Breeder Selection/Carcasses and second in Egg Production. Toll placed first individually in Breeder Selection/Carcasses and Edmonds won the Egg Production contest.

"I was hoping to at least place in Breeder Selection since I never have before," said Toll, who went to the competition last year with the team as an alternate.

The team is coached by Dr. Scott Beyer and included two alternates who are on the team, but did not actually judge in the competition: Lucinda Sullivan, freshman in the pre-health professionals program and Zach Edgerton, sophomore in agribusiness.

"We've wanted to get first for the last three years because we've got second so many times," Toll said.

False organizations scam consumers after attacks on America

BY KECIA N. SEYB
Kansas State Collegian

More con artists erupted following Sept. 11, scamming charitable people, officials said.

"We believe a lot of people were scammed and didn't ever know it," said Holly Anderson, spokeswoman for the National Consumer's League. "With some scams, they tell you you're going to receive a prize in the mail, but with charity fraud, you're just giving money, and you don't expect anything in return."

Organizations conduct solicitations for relief through the mail, by telephone, in door-to-door requests, stationing themselves outside stores or traffic intersections, through the Internet, as well as in announcements in magazines, newspapers, radio and television. Some of these organizations could be fraudulent.

Anderson said that following the Sept. 11 attacks, several new charities bloomed, making it tough for people to know whether they were donating to legitimate organizations or door-to-door, telemarketing or e-mail scammers. She said donors need to be careful before they give money to charities, especially if they have unfamiliar names.

"Do business with people you know, you trust," she said. "Give to names you know, you trust."

Since Oct. 4, the Internet Fraud Complaint Center has received more than 110,000 tips on fraudulent e-mails, said Jamie Varbel, communications and marketing director for the Kansas Credit Union Association.

Varbel said people who feel suspicious about someone claiming to raise money for a charity should simply ask the door-to-door people where their donation is going and for information.

"People who don't have that information together — that should be a red flag right there," Varbel said. "People — their heartstrings are being pulled in that area. Be cautious."

One such con artist sent an e-mail asking for financial support so he could use a computer system to track Osama bin Laden, Anderson said. He asked readers to forward money to a bank account somewhere in Estonia, she said.

"People believe this. They fall for it," Anderson said. "I could see my grandma thinking she was going to help catch Osama bin Laden."

In another instance, the scammer called asking for money, saying he was from the Fireman's Fund, but the consumer continued to ask questions. Then the scammer hung up. The consumer became mad, Anderson said, had caller ID and called the number back. The scammer answered the phone with just "hello."

Bennett Weiner, chief operating officer for the Better Business Bureau Wise Giving Alliance, said donors should ask for three things if they are suspicious about charities — a detailed program description, a budget that shows how much they plan to raise and where they're going to spend it and a roster of the board of directors.

Weiner said that following Sept. 11, more than 200 organizations began raising money, and at least 120 of those were new organizations. "These groups were starting out to raise money very quickly, and people were making assessments on Donation giving tips

- Those making donations should be aware of the following:
- Ask what the donation is going to do specifically and how much of your donation will be used for the activity mentioned in the appeal.
- Beware of emotional appeals that don't describe what the donations will actually go to help.
- Don't give cash. Make checks or money orders to the charity and not the individual collecting the donation.
- Don't be pressured into making a donation on the spot.
- Don't give your credit card number or other personal information to a telephone solicitor. Ask for written information that describes the charity's programs and finances.
- Be careful when dealing with charities that are reluctant to answer questions about their operations, finances and programs.
- Be wary of new charities.

U.S. airstrikes on fortress in Afghanistan squelch Taliban prisoner uprising

BY MATT KELLEY
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — American airstrikes helped subdue an uprising by Taliban prisoners of war at a fortress in northern Afghanistan, U.S. military spokesmen said Sunday. Hundreds of the foreign Taliban prisoners were killed, but U.S. military forces were all accounted for, Pentagon officials said.

The U.S. Central Command, which oversees the war in Afghanistan, declined to say if U.S. forces were in the fortress when the fighting broke out. But a German television crew at the scene of the fight taped a U.S. special forces soldier calling in U.S. airstrikes on the fortress near the city of Mazar-e-Sharif.

The U.S. soldier, who identified himself only as David, is shown on the video from Germany's ARD network.

"I don't know how many Americans there were," he says on the tape. "I think one was killed, but I'm not sure. There were two of us at least, me and some other guy."

A Pentagon spokesman, Marine Lt. Col. David Lapan, said later that no U.S. military personnel were killed in the uprising.

"All our military forces in Afghanistan are accounted for," he said.

Tom Crispell, a spokesman for the Central Intelligence Agency, which has operatives working with anti-Taliban forces in Afghanistan, said the agency had no comment on the operation.

The Taliban fighters, who had been captured near the militia's last northern stronghold of Kunduz, carried concealed weapons and tried to fight their way out of the fortress, Pentagon spokesman Lt. Col. Dan Stoneking said.

Both Culler and Stoneking said U.S. aircraft bombed the fortress during the fighting. Witnesses said the bombs hit an area of the compound where the Taliban fighters were.

The U.S. special forces troops in Afghanistan work with anti-Taliban military commanders, including Rashid Dostum, whose forces held the prisoners. The U.S. troops also carry radios and other equipment to call for and guide U.S. airstrikes against Taliban forces.

The Taliban soldiers appeared to have planned the battle, which appears to be a suicide mission on their part, Culler said. Most of the Taliban fighters were not Afghans and were from Pakistan and Chechnya, Stoneking said.

Dostum brought in about 500 of his fighters to quell the uprising, Stoneking said.

Foreign fighters in Kunduz had insisted on security guarantees following reports of summary executions by the northern alliance in Mazar-e-Sharif and Kabul, the Afghan capital.

Since Sept. 11, there has been an overflowing of generosity throughout the nation. Unfortunately, some have stationed themselves to take advantage of the donation influx.

Several groups have conned people into giving money to fraudulent charities. They have claimed the money would go toward various facets of the Sept. 11 fund.

Holly Anderson, spokeswoman for the National Consumer's League, said donors need to be careful when they give money to charities. She said to be especially wary of groups with unfamiliar names.

Bennett Weiner, chief operating officer for the Better Business Bureau Wise-Giving Alliance, said donors should ask for three things if they are suspicious about charities — a detailed program description, a budget that shows how much they plan to raise and where they're going to spend it and a roster of the board of directors.

It is important for everyone to keep giving as much as they can right now. Whether it is to local charities or to national ones, don't let con artists keep you from giving.

Yet, it also is important to research who you are giving to. Otherwise your money might not go to help those in need. Rather it will serve those who are infested with greed.

Able international GTA's deserve credit, not blame

Editor,

As a student here at K-State, I take things for granted a lot of the time: friendly people, a solid football program and until recently, international graduate teaching assistants. I feel I am not alone.

Time and time again, I have heard fellow classmates whine about not understanding their teachers and blaming their poor performances on their inability to understand. I am here to tell you that it is not the fault of the teacher, but rather the students.

K-State, as well as the Kansas Board of Regents, makes sure our international GTAs have the necessary language skills needed to teach college-level courses. Not only do they have the intellect even to be admitted into graduate school, but they possess required communication skills as well.

I attribute a lot of the problems that students have with GTAs to a couple of things. First, they are too busy joking around in class and nodding off to actually try to listen and comprehend what their teachers are saying. Or they are so hung up on the idea that there is no way that they can understand them, they shut their teachers out completely.

We are college students. We should grow up and own up to our own faults. We should not try to pin our problems on a great asset such as our international teachers.

They bring diversity to our classrooms with a view of the world we are not accustomed to. A lot of times, a teacher from another country can give a fresh perspective to an otherwise tired subject and make learning interesting again. So join me in thanking our international graduate teaching assistants for enriching our college careers and making learning a fun thing again.

Preparing for career not guarantee of success

As I try to find my first post-graduation job, I've had to participate in one of the most feared aspects of the career search — the interview. Talking about yourself is a bit harder than it seems.

My favorite question is: "Where do you see yourself in 10 years?"

The answer changes every time. Who really knows where we'll be a decade from now?

In the past four years, I've changed everything, from my hair color to my major. How could I possibly predict what will change in the next 10 years?

I would imagine this question is meant to gain a better understanding of the candidate's career goals. However, so many other circumstances affect one's professional objectives — relationships, education, money, family, friends, etc.

Who can be completely certain of his or her career path?

I wish there were crystal balls to predict the future.

At the university level, everyone tries so hard to give students a glimpse of what could be. We have extremely specific majors, advisers to guide us and professors to nurture our skills to help us set concrete courses of action. We have Career and Employment Services to make sure we know where to find all the right resources.

We try to secure every last detail, but nothing is certain.

I've met many people with incredible jobs — positions I would've gladly taken from them if given the opportunity. I've asked each of them how they landed such a great job. The response was the same each time — simple chance got them the job.

It's impossible to plan for chance.

K-State has tried to prepare us for all the possibilities. We've taken general education classes. We've had hours upon hours of electives. We have done everything conceivable just to get kicked out into the world of uncertainty.

We can't take classes in unpredictability. We can't quiz out of fate.

We're graduating into a world that is more uncertain than ever. Preparing for the details won't help bring the big picture into focus.

This is where the crystal ball would come in handy.

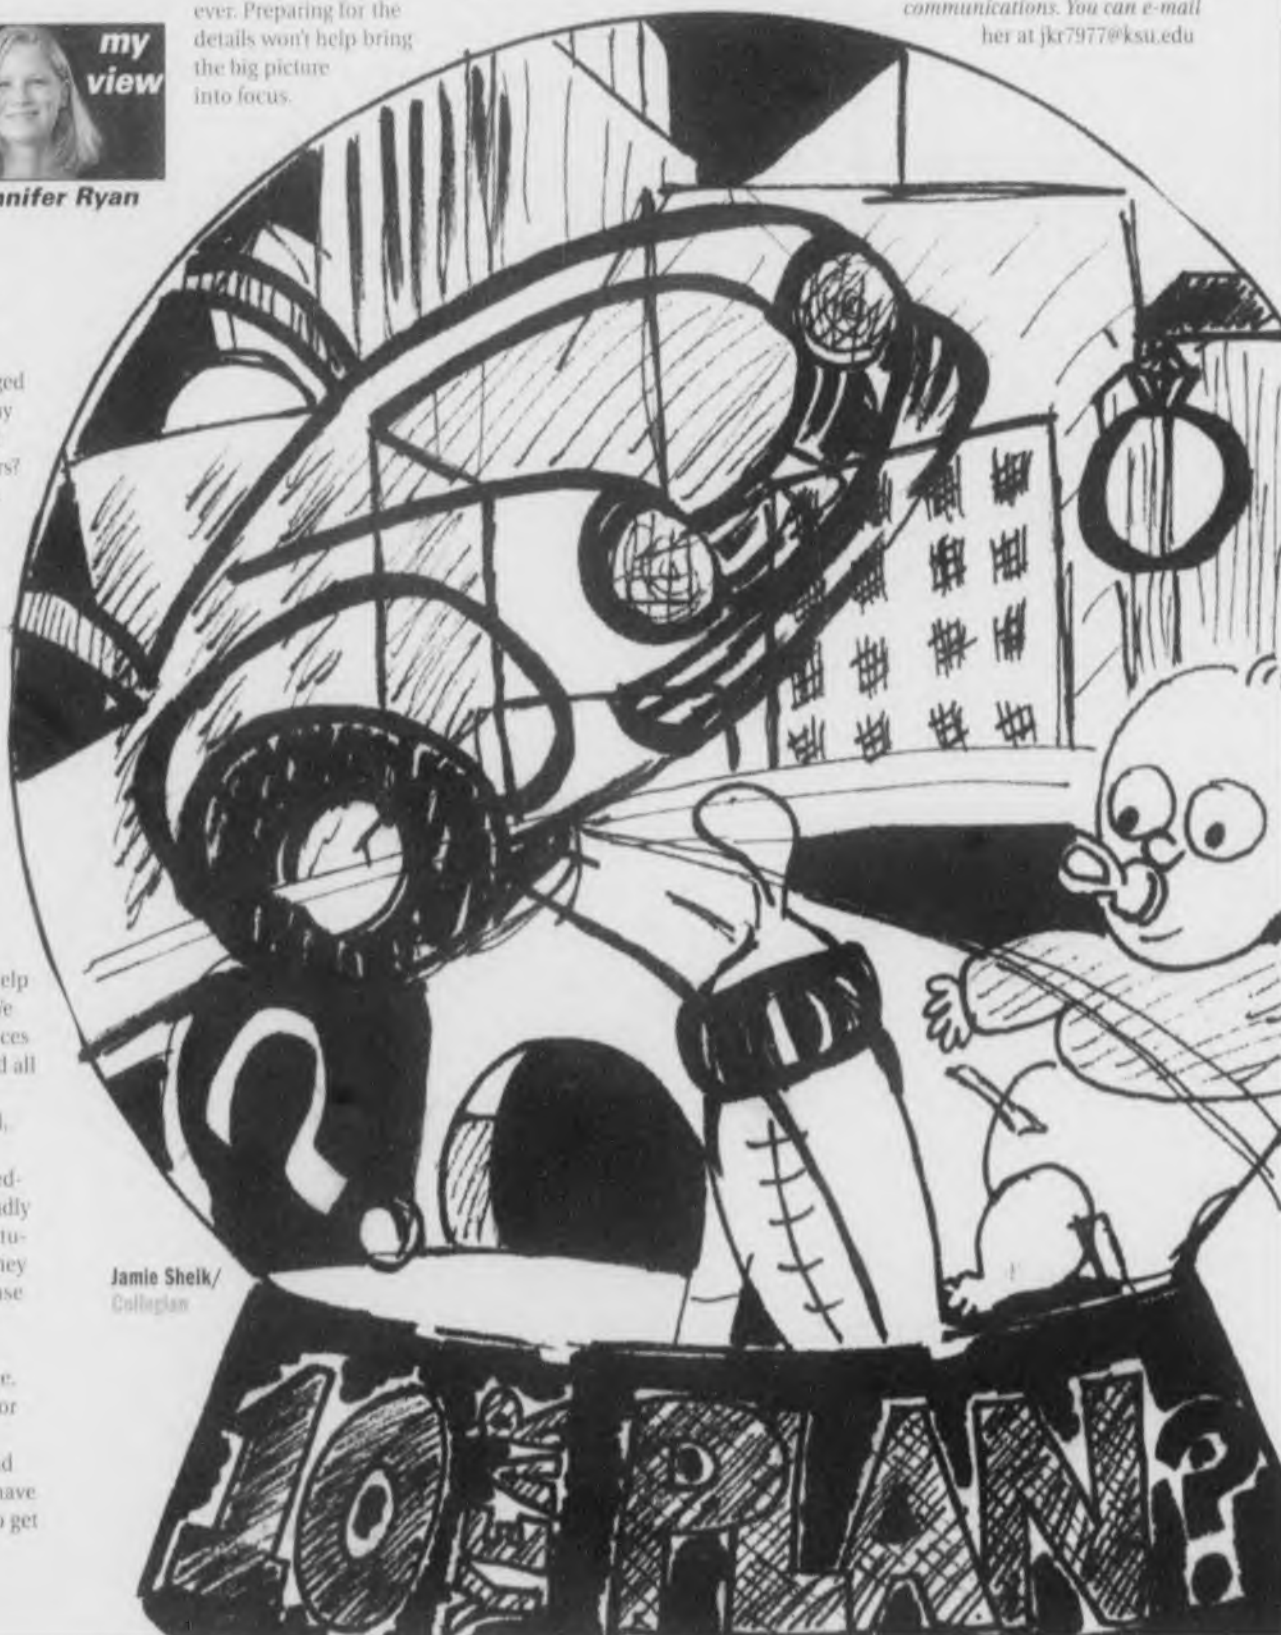

So where do I see myself in 10 years?

I'll just leave it up to destiny.

Parents, theaters should monitor movie choices of minors

Today's parents are irresponsible. OK, I've made my point, so we all can go home now, right?

Wrong. I still have a few more things to say (and for the satisfaction of one of my friends, I'm not going to lecture from the liberal podium. This is from an all-sides, common sense podium).

What I meant by the overly dramatic first sentence is referring to parents who let their obviously underage children watch PG-13 and R-rated movies. Do these parents have no decency?

I was at Seth Childs Cinema with my husband the weekend before Thanksgiving, waiting in one of the theaters for "Shallow Hal" to begin, when several children (appearing to be between the ages of 6 and 10) came in and sat down. My husband and I looked at each other, and I made a comment like, "Monsters, Inc." is down the hall," or something like that. We both had a laugh, but I was serious.

I couldn't believe all of the underage children waiting patiently for the PG-13-rated movie to start. All I could do was ask myself, "Where are their parents?"

Then I started to think like a child. We've all been there, right? It wasn't too long before I came to the conclusion that those youngsters most likely bought tickets to "Monsters, Inc.," or some other film, but later snuck inside the "Shallow Hal" theater. They then all came in right as the previews were starting.

I've worked at a movie theater before, and it was policy for staff to stand outside the different theaters and check ticket stubs before letting people in.

If people looked too young to view a certain movie alone, they had to have an adult of legal age accompany them. So, why, when this policy seems so logical, doesn't Seth Childs protect the eyes and ears of youngsters by checking before admitting them into films?

There are so many things children shouldn't be watching or won't even understand in PG-13 and R-rated films. This is why they are rated in this manner. Yet it seems more and more common that children of younger ages are being exposed to films way out of their age range. And it doesn't stop there, either. I could go on to talk about computer and video games and music preferences, but that is a whole other column entirely.

So the parents aren't completely to blame. But they still are partially at fault.

Granted, some of the young children probably did sneak into the theater, but some of them could have bought the PG-13 movie tickets or had someone buy the tickets for them. This could happen while the parents are on their way out of the parking lot after dropping their children off at the doors.

I can just see it now. "What movie are you going to see, Johnny?"

"I want to see 'Monsters Inc.'"

"Sounds good. I'll see you in a couple of hours."

I wish my parents had been that naive. They wouldn't let me see a PG-13 movie until a month before my 13th birthday. It was "Ghost," and I had to beg and plead for over an hour before they finally gave in.

I couldn't even watch R-rated films until I was 16. I was mad at the time, but I thank my parents now for being so cautious.

In a time when I'm going to be having children in a few years, I look to that guidance I had growing up and use it as the good example by which to raise them.

I'm not going to be the parent who just drops her children off at the doors and drives away. I'm going to make sure they watch the movie they say they're going to watch. They, too, will thank me in the long run.

Children today don't seem to have that guidance. Today's parents have gotten more and more irresponsible and lazy. It's a whole other generation of children today, getting away with things I wouldn't have even dared to when I was growing up.

These parents need to reexamine the values their parents instilled in them and apply them toward the raising of their children. And the people working at Seth Childs Cinema should rethink their policies regarding children's admittance to films.

The parents only can do so much. Once the children are inside the theater's doors, it's the theater's duty to uphold the law.

do you feel a longing for more in your life?

IS GOD CALLING YOU do you radiate joy? AND GETTING A BUSY SIGNAL?

do you long to follow in the footsteps of Jesus?

In today's world, it's so easy to lose sight of why we're really here. So perhaps the thought of devoting your entire life to God has never crossed your mind.

Then again maybe it has. Maybe you're one of the rare women who are being called by God to follow in the footsteps of Jesus. And if you'd only take a moment to really listen to your inner voice, God will get through.

We are the Sisters of St. Joseph, an international order with roots right here in Wichita. And we invite you to come live a life of holiness, in a community where we strive for unity and reconciliation among all people with God and with one another. Ours is a community of prayer and service. Our dedication to God motivates us and is the source of joy for all that we do.

But how can you know if you truly have been called? Do you feel a longing for more in your life? Do you feel a void in your heart? Do you radiate joy? Does love pour out of your smile and do you long to follow Jesus?

If so, you owe it to yourself to answer God's call. To learn more about The Sisters of St. Joseph, call or visit us online. You'll be eternally grateful you did.

BIG 12 CONFERENCE

FOOTBALL WEEKEND WRAPUP

NEBRASKA (2) 36
COLORADO (14) 62
Colorado ended the Huskers' national championship hopes in front of a packed Folsom Field in what arguably was the nation's biggest upset of the weekend. The Buffaloes' win looked up Colorado's first trip to the Big 12 Championship game in the school's history against Texas next weekend.

OKLAHOMA STATE 16
OKLAHOMA (4) 13
Oklahoma State upset the Sooners' hopes for a return to the Big 12 Championship game and gave the Texas Longhorns an early Christmas present by holding the defending national champs to zero yards rushing on the day. The Cowboys also halted the nation's longest winning streak at 19 games. The loss came a day after No. 2 Nebraska fell to No. 14 Colorado in Boulder.

TEXAS (5) 21
TEXAS A&M 7
Texas did its part to get into the national championship picture by beating Texas A&M on Friday in College Station. Longhorn freshman running back Cedric Benson scored two touchdowns and gained 79 yards on 27 carries to fall short of Ricky Williams' freshman record of 990 yards by 16. Texas and Colorado will play for the Big 12 Championship this weekend in Dallas.

IOWA 14
IOWA STATE 17
Tony Velk's 32-yard field goal early in the fourth quarter proved to be the difference late in the ballgame, but the Cyclones needed a late interception from Adam Runk to keep the Hawkeyes from completing their comeback in Ames on Saturday. It was Iowa State's fourth straight win in the series after suffering 15 consecutive losses to its cross-state rival.

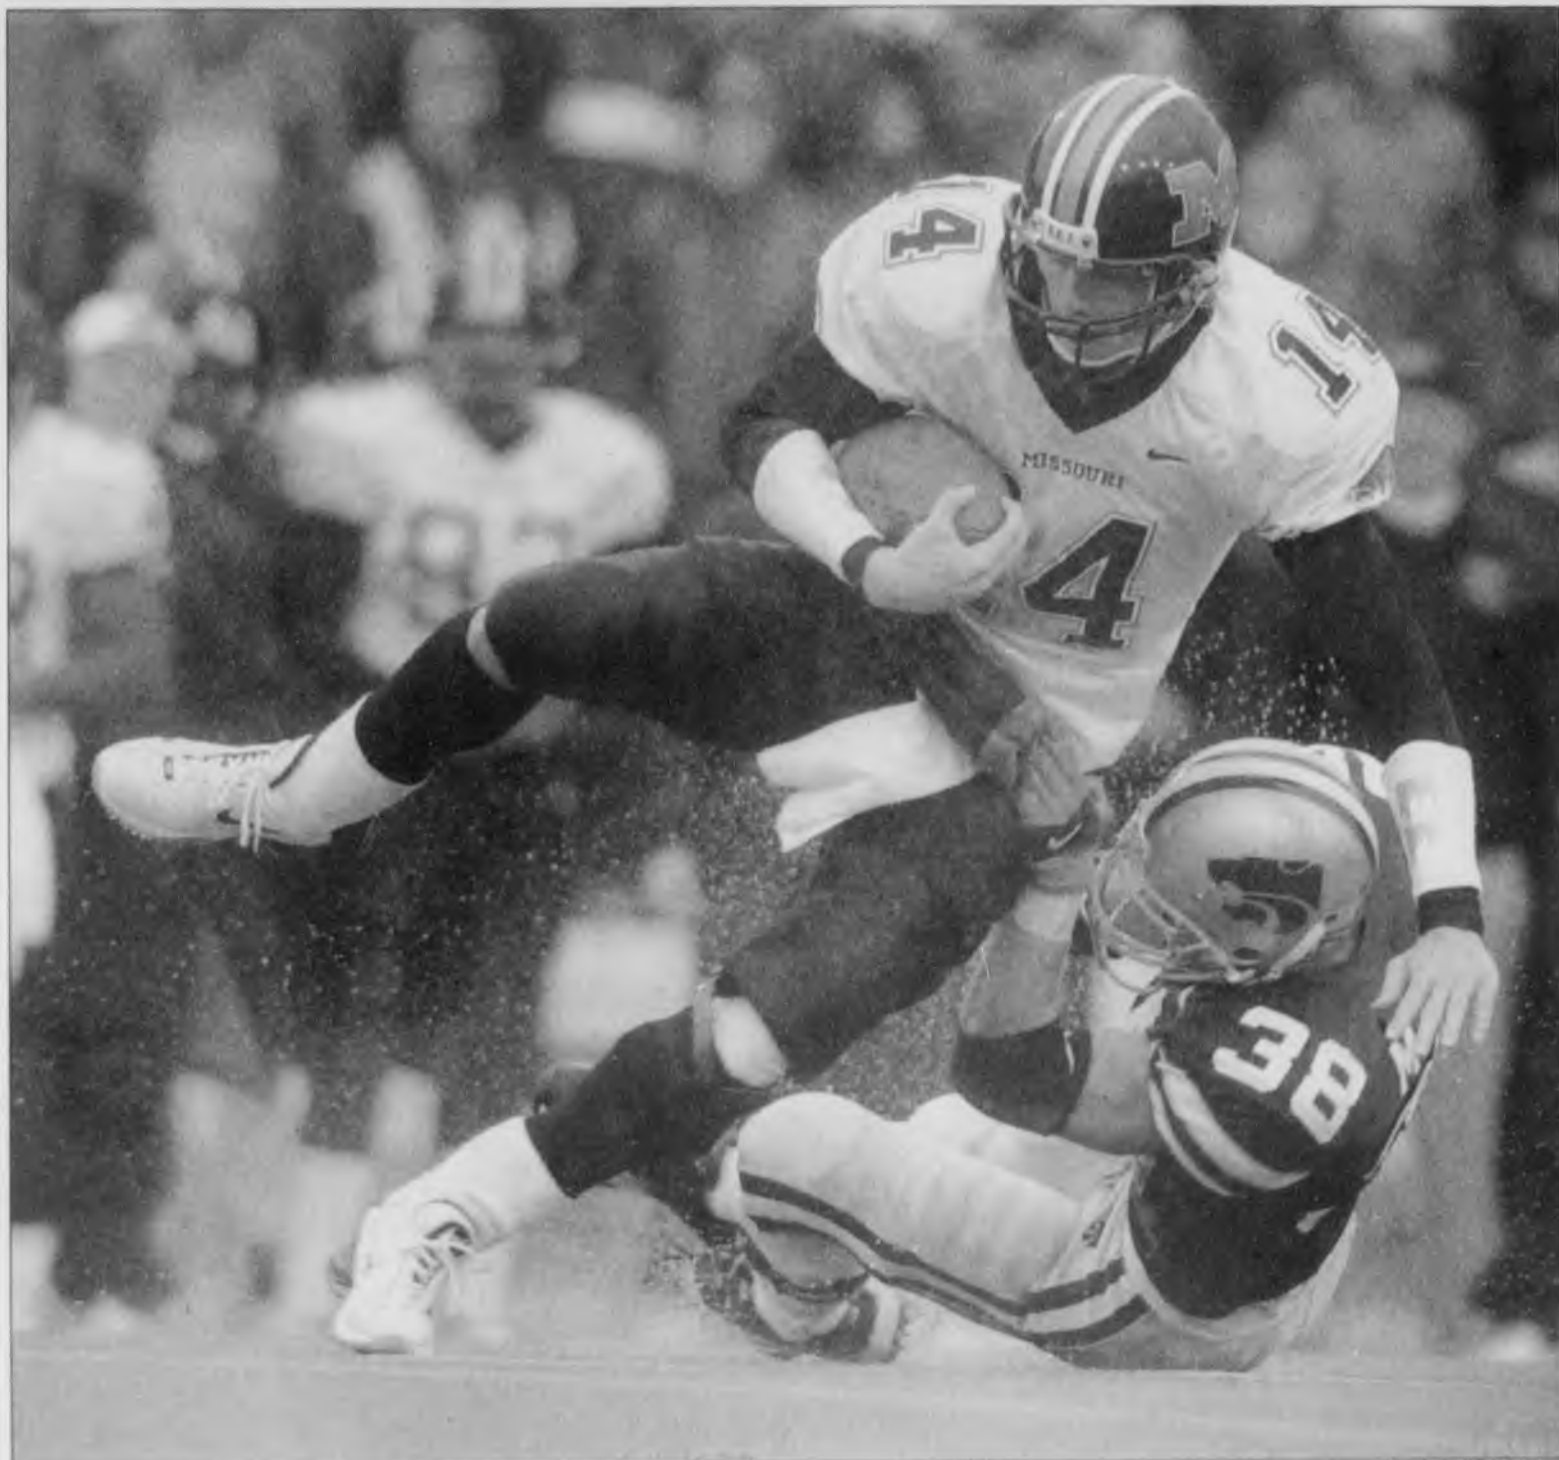

SOUTHERN ILLINOIS 12
BAYLOR 56
Baylor managed to get its third win of the season in its final game in Waco. The Bears got a solid effort from freshman quarterback Aaron Karas, who passed for 331 yards and three touchdowns in the contest, and defensive back Samir Al-Amin picked off two passes to extend the Salukis' losing streak to seven games, and snap the Bears' skid at eight games.

WYOMING 14
KANSAS 27
Kansas earned interim head coach Tom Hayes' first victory with the Jayhawks. KU got 168 yards on the ground from tailback Reggie Duncan and 221 yards through the air from quarterback Mario Kinsey. The Jayhawk win snapped a six-game losing streak, and raised Hayes' record to 1-2 since taking over for former coach Terry Allen.

STEPHEN F. AUSTIN 3
TEXAS TECH 58
Texas Tech recovered from a heartbreaking loss to Oklahoma last week with a 58-3 shellacking of the Lumberjacks. Red Raider quarterback Cliff Kingsbury solidified his position as the Big 12's top passer, completing 39 of 47 passes for 366 yards and five touchdowns. Kingsbury's day was good enough to set Texas Tech's single-season record for passing yards with 3,499.

Seniors win finale; Cats qualify for bowl

BY DAN SMITH

Kansas State Collegian

The emotions ran high as Wildcat fans got their opportunity to say goodbye to 27 K-State seniors Saturday at rain-soaked KSU Stadium prior to the Cats' regular-season finale with Missouri.

And if the pre-game ceremony weren't enough to drum up sufficient motivation for the Wildcats before a must-win tussle with the Tigers, the threat of snapping a long postseason-appearance streak might have provided the extra spark.

The Cats' bowl scenario was simple — win and you're in, lose and you're home for the holidays — and this time, momentum was on K-State's sideline.

"I'm really happy for our seniors, and I thought it was awfully important for them because they're looking at not only what takes place for them, but there's a little bit of a tradition that's built up.

And part of it's centered around having the opportunity to participate in consecutive bowls, and they didn't want to be the group to let it end," head coach Bill Snyder said.

K-State's seniors wouldn't let it end, though, as the Cats (5-5, 3-3) dealt Missouri (4-6, 3-3) a 24-3 loss to become bowl eligible for the ninth consecutive season.

The win also marked the culmination of what could be considered the greatest single-season turnaround in 90 years, when the Cats went winless in their first four games before finishing with a 5-4-1 mark in 1911.

This season, K-State bounced back from a 2-4 start and won four of its final five games to climb over the .500 mark for the first time since Sept. 29.

"We salvaged a pretty dismal season, and we were all pretty low at those times," senior linebacker Ben Leber said. "We knew we had to bounce back and as Coach Snyder says, 'Just keep sawing wood,' and that's what we were doing. And it feels

Leber named 1st team in Big 12 conference

K-State senior linebacker Ben Leber was named to the Sixth All-Big 12 Conference Coaches Football Team, conference officials announced Friday.

Leber, who tallied six tackles in Saturday's 24-3 win over Missouri, joins Dick Butkus Award finalist Rocky Calmus of Oklahoma as the squad's two first-team linebackers.

The 6-foot-4, 250-pound senior from Vermilion, S.D., led the Wildcats in tackles during the regular season with 74, including 15 tackles for a loss. Leber also registered five and a half sacks during the Cats' 11 games.

Four Wildcats made it on to the All-Conference second team. Seniors Josh Scobey and Aaron Lockett and juniors Tank Reese and Terence Newman all earned the nod.

Sophomore offensive lineman Nick Leckey, junior defensive end Henry Bryant and senior safety Jon McGraw were voted on to the third team, and eight other Wildcats earned an honorable mention from the Conference.

Scobey leaves mark on K-State rushing records

BY DEREK BOSS

Kansas State Collegian

Josh Scobey wasn't expected to be another typical K-State runningback when he arrived two years ago from Northeastern A&M (Okla.) Community College.

The hype he received before the 2000 spring game can attest to that.

And with Scobey's 198 yards and two touchdowns Saturday in the Cats' 24-3 win over Missouri, he'll be anything but typical when it comes to the K-State record books.

Scobey vaulted into first place all-time in single-season rushing yards with 1,263, surpassing a nearly 30-year-old record held by Isaac Jackson (1,137), and earned his seventh 100-yard game of the year, a new single-season mark.

He also reached 31 rushing touchdowns for his career, which extended his own record and moved him into a first-place tie with Mack Herron (1968-69) for most total career touchdowns.

"Just think if he had four years here — Lord knows what he could've done," fullback Rock Cartwright said of Scobey, who ranks fifth all-time in career rushing yards at K-State with 1,981. "But two years here and single-season leading rusher — you can't ask for more than that."

But offensive guard Andy Eby said he had no idea Scobey was on the verge of breaking so many records. It just was something the senior tailback seemed to keep to himself.

"Josh didn't talk much about it," Eby said. "I really didn't even know it was an option. He's a team player, and he doesn't care about accolades. Our main goal here was to go out and get bowl eligible."

The Cats did for the ninth straight season, and amid the cold, drizzly weather, it was Scobey who provided the offense.

"He's been very consistent this year," quarterback Marc Dunn said. "When things go bad and we get in a rut, we know we can go to Scobe and he's going to pull through for us."

Despite a slow first quarter, including a fumbled pitch in the Missouri red zone, Scobey began to find his stride in the next period. The 6-foot, 205-pounder rumbled for a personal-best 104 yards in the second quarter and helped the Cats nab a 10-0 lead at the break.

"It was wet out there, and that's one thing that kind of slows you down as a runner when it's wet and slippery," Scobey said, "and I was just trying to get a feel for things early on."

In the third, it was more Scobey.

On the Cats' second series of the half, the senior took a toss left and went nearly untouched down the sideline for a 37-yard score.

"Nick Leckey came through and cleaned the guy up," Scobey said, "and I when I saw that, I was like, 'Wow.' And then, Rock cleaned a guy up and from there on, I pretty much walked in the end zone."

"When you've got guys around you making plays like they made — like they've been making all season — it makes it that much easier."

Scobey said the records mean a lot to him, but he couldn't have done it without his supporting cast, particularly Cartwright and an offensive line that had battled injuries all season.

"It feels good, but it was a total offensive effort. All those guys out there working hard — they helped me accomplish all these touchdowns and all these yards that I made."

"And I'd like to say 'Thank you,' because it's been a hell of a ride, and we've got one more to go. I'd die for these guys."

Redford, Pitt team up for action-packed film

One of the most dynamic combinations in film history lends a sense of excitement and drama to "Spy Game."

"SPY GAME" ★★★★★

MOVIE REVIEW BY CORBIN H. CRABLE

Robert Redford ("The Horse Whisperer") teams up with Brad Pitt ("Interview with the Vampire") in a harrowing tale of a CIA agent (Redford) on the brink of retiring who must respond to his younger partner, a former CIA assassin (Pitt) who has been jailed overseas on charges of espionage and will be executed in 24 hours. Now the mentor and pupil must heal old wounds and work together to survive.

Redford and Pitt are the two latest additions to Hollywood's obsession with pitting an older, more experienced actor (pardon the pun) with a younger, sexier actor. The chemistry between Redford and Pitt works fantastically here, as both characters seem to be genuinely haunted by their past and trying to work past their tension. Placing Redford and Pitt in the same film and making it work shows that indeed, the big screen is big enough for both of them.

The plot is an intricately woven tale that might lose some viewers with its quick pace, so be sure to pay attention to the developments. The story takes us from Washington to Berlin to Vietnam to Beirut, and the diversified locations where the movie takes us to alone are enough to maintain the interest of someone who might not be into the spy/action genre.

Probably the only monkey wrench in this well-oiled machine is the apparently ageless main characters. Peppered throughout the movie are flashbacks of Redford and Pitt, who look to be the same age as they are presented in present day. My guess is that the actual age difference between Redford and Pitt made it difficult to pull that off.

Lovers of mystery, action and intrigue will be captivated by the rich storyline and impressive effects. If not, at least see "Spy Game" for two of Hollywood's most successful leading men.

Guest musicians join Jagger for new album

There's no way this album could have gone wrong.

Take one of the most recognized superstars ever, stir in some stars of their own right, add a dash of hype and you've got a record that's guaranteed at least platinum status. And the music isn't bad, either.

Mick Jagger's "Goddess in the Doorway," his first solo album since 1993, matches the Rolling Stone up with various other artists to create a collaborative effort that packs juiced-up rockers right alongside acoustic ballads.

The artistic jump on this album is something needed for Jagger, who has become stuck in the Rolling Stone's mindset long enough for it to lose much of its original vitality.

"Goddess" is more interesting than anything the Stones have done in at least the past 15 years, allowing Jagger to sing what he really wants to write sans Keith Richards. Full-blown rockers, the likes of which haven't been heard from the band at least since the 1980s, pack the punch of the album. In "God Gave Me Everything," Jagger gets together with Lenny Kravitz to stomp through a driving rock beat.

On the very next track, Jagger pairs up with hip-hop mastermind Wyclef Jean to help him build the Caribbean reggae feel of "Hideaway."

More than showing a diversified talent, Jagger seems to be showing his diversified tastes. He's chosen some of the top dogs in their fields because he can't create an interesting album on his own. Anyone remember "Supernatural"? Well, if Santana's multi-platinum record is any indicator of the success of collaboration albums, Jagger's sure to go home with a few Grammys this spring.

Indeed, most of the best songs on "Goddess" just wouldn't work without the cameo appearances of some renowned talent. "Joy" sounds as if it practically were written just so Bono would have something to sing on the album. And of his experience writing with pop-guru Rob Thomas, in an interview in the December "Rolling Stone," Jagger said, "I would have never written 'Visions of Paradise' on my own."

Still, the album is very listenable, even if you can't chalk it all up to Jagger's artistry.

At least he has good taste in whom he collaborates with. Pete Townshend's guitar hooks drive songs such as "Gun" and spice up "Joy" as well.

As for the lyricism, it's more introspective than Jagger's work with the Stones.

On "Too Far Gone," he bares his ironic love for the days when the Stones were young and on top of the world. Jagger puts himself into the song as he sings "Always hate nostalgia / Living in the past / No use gettin' misty-eyed / It all screamed by so fast."

"Goddess" shows that Jagger definitely is a viable solo artist with a wealth of experience to draw from in his writing.

It's just hard to tell whether you can say it's all thanks to the man himself or the talent he brings in.

New Lawrence movie fails to produce many laughs

Martin Lawrence just keeps making worse and worse movies.

Someone should tell him that there are jokes to be written that, believe it or not, don't rely on the fact that he's black. The comedian has been playing the black-man-out-of-place card too often for it to be funny anymore.

"Black Knight" is no exception. Lawrence plays a maintenance man who hares his job at Castle World, a rundown medieval theme park. When he finds a strange medallion in the water, he grabs it and is transported to 14th-century England.

He promptly gets himself in over his head with the royalty and must pretend to be a French messenger while adapting his urban disposition to medieval customs. From then on, pretty much every joke is dark ages. It gets old quickly.

Think of the movie as the opposite of

"BLACK KNIGHT" ★★★★★

MOVIE REVIEW BY JJ DUNCAN

"Just Visiting," which stuck two 12th-century French knights in modern-day Chicago, only this movie isn't very funny.

It's too hard to see Martin Lawrence, a talented comedian and actor who has done some great movies, sink deeper and deeper with films like this and "Blue Streak." If Lawrence would take the right script, he has the potential to make it something to remember. "Black Knight," written by Darryl J. Quarles ("Big Momma's House"), is not that script.

The movie garners a few laughs due solely to Lawrence's strong onscreen presence. Fortunately, he's an actor that occasionally can bring life into dead-tired lines.

Unfortunately, "Black Knight" is no box-office dark horse. There are better movies to spend your money on.

Cats set record for wins

BY SEAN PURCELL
Kansas State Collegian

With K-State's 3-0 win over Missouri on Wednesday night, the Cats not only set a school record for conference wins in a season with 15, but also extended a season-high seven match-winning streak heading into the postseason.

Before the Wildcats could look ahead to the NCAA tournament, however, they had to wrestle Missouri, a team that tested K-State in the schools' first meeting. Although the Cats won the grueling five-setter back in late September, Missouri had chances to take the match during the deciding game.

Flash forward to Nov. 21. K-State, winner of six straight, didn't show signs of letting up against Missouri. The inconsistent Tigers proved to be just a speed bump for the Cats, as K-State rolled over Missouri 30-26, 30-23, 30-19.

The No. 19 Cats (19-7, 15-5) now look to their sixth consecutive NCAA tournament appearance. The 64-team bracket will be released today at 2 p.m. K-State has not hosted a postseason match since 1996.

Missouri (20-9, 10-9) didn't just lie down for the Cats, however. Both teams fought through struggles, but it was K-State that found ways to win each game.

In game one, the Cats won the battle of poor hitting teams. Although K-State posted an unsightly .091 hitting percentage, the Tigers found the mark less frequently, hitting just .055. Despite the hitting woes, K-State took the first game 30-26.

The tale was much different as K-State committed just one hitting error in a 30-23 victory in the second set. The Wildcats sizzled on a .432 hitting percentage and capitalized on the Tigers' continuing struggles.

In the final game, the Wildcats continued to stop the Missouri attack as K-State's defense held the Tigers to .045 hitting. The Cats finished Missouri off with a 30-19 victory in game three.

Although K-State seemed to ease past the Tigers statistically, Missouri posted similar numbers overall. The Wildcats did, however, tally more kills (53-39) on a significantly better hitting percentage (.257-.083), but it was the Tigers who dug more balls (70-62).

Senior Liz Wegner led three Wildcats in double-digit kills with 15, while sophomore Lauren Goehring added 12 kills, and senior Lisa Mimick posted 11. Mimick also recorded her 12th double-double of the season, leading the team with 18 digs. Freshman Gabby Guerre also turned in a double-double, posting 42 assists and 11 digs.

The victory over the Tigers extended K-State's all-time series edge over Missouri to 29-26. The Cats also swept the season-series from the Tigers, the first time since 1999. K-State's 19th regular season win continued a streak of at least 19 wins for the seventh straight year.

K-State loses close contest to Ole Miss

K-State point guard Larry Reid tries to regain control of the ball after Ole Miss' Justin Reed stole it from him during the second half of Saturday's game at Bramlage Coliseum.

BY DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Travis Reynolds could only shake his head as Ole Miss point guard Jason Harrison drilled the game-winning free throws.

With the score knotted at 65, Larry Reid's pull-up jumper fell short, and Reynolds — trying for the steal — was called for a reach-in foul on Harrison with 1.5 seconds left as the Rebels (3-1) outlasted K-State (2-1) 67-65 Saturday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

"It was a foul because he called it a foul. It was a foul," Reynolds said. "I thought I got it clean, but the refs called it a foul, so we've got to live with that call."

"I thought I could get it from behind him, but I shouldn't have did it. It was a mistake on my fault. That's what I told the guys in the locker room."

Head coach Jim Woodriddle called a 30-second timeout with 0:24 left so the Cats could hold for the final shot. It all rested on Reid — who had 22 points for the game, including 16 in the second half.

"We had set something else up, but I told him coming out of the timeout, I said, 'If there's no pressure on you, just bring it back up and flatten it out, and go get you a shot.'"

Reid did, dribbling left from the top of the key and pulling up over the 5-foot-5 Harrison for a 15-footer.

"I thought it was going in the way I was feeling that second half," Reid said. "I just knew it was going to be all net."

But it wasn't. The ball hit the front of the rim, and found the hands of forward Justin Reed, who made the outlet pass to Harrison with seconds remaining, when Reynolds' instincts led to the crucial foul.

"Boy, just the action happened so quick, and you hear the whistle in the backcourt," Woodriddle said, "and those things shouldn't happen, but they did."

"And I told Travis, 'You've got to get your head up.' He fought that game as hard as a guy can fight it, and competed, and I thought our whole team did. I thought our team grew a little bit tonight."

K-State fell behind early, much like last Tuesday night against Wisconsin-Green Bay, though the Cats — behind 18 points from Reynolds — bounced back to win 68-55.

On Saturday, Woodriddle's club trailed the Rebels by 17 with 7:47 to play in the first half, but a 12-4 K-State run would help narrow that gap to 37-28 at the break.

"They're a tested group," Reynolds said. "That same team went to the Sweet 16 last year. They got off to a good start, but we weathered the storm and got back in it."

The two teams traded baskets early in the second half, before K-State mustered an 11-1 run to knot the score at 46 with 13:24 to play, getting the crowd of 8,632 into the game.

Pervis Pasco's free throws at the 10:07 mark gave the Cats their first lead since early in the contest, 2-1, but Ole Miss mounted an 8-0 run to regain control.

K-State wouldn't die, though, expending a 9-2 spurt to nab a 61-60 advantage with less than four minutes to go, and it would be down to the wire the rest of the way.

"We found out a lot about our team tonight," Woodriddle said. "It's a team that has to adopt an underdog mentality. This is the only way we're going to beat people in our league is to scrap and scrape — we just need to attach ourselves to that identity every time we take the floor and see what happens."

But Woodriddle admits that the home crowd gave his squad a much-needed spark.

"I'm not so sure that our players could have come back had it not been for our fans," he said. "It's like what I've been saying early on — give us the sixth man."

"And they were tonight."

Wildcat women split games played over Thanksgiving

BY MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State women's basketball team has spent most of its Thanksgiving break in St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, for the Paradise Jam Tournament.

The field includes Richmond, No. 21/25 Arizona State and Western Michigan.

On Saturday, the Cats defeated Richmond 85-63.

Ohlde led K-State with 21 points and 10 rebounds, while Koehn added 18 points. Wecker scored 16 points and grabbed nine rebounds, and Bethman tallied 12 points and had a team-high five assists.

The Cats shot 53 percent from the floor in the first half to take a 44-33 lead. They also hit 7 of 20 from three-point range.

Richmond was led by Elise Ryder, who scored 22 points. The Spiders' record dropped to 1-2 overall.

On Sunday, K-State faced its first ranked opponent of the season in the Arizona State Sun Devils.

The Cats outshot and out-rebounded Arizona State in the first half but still trailed 35-28 at halftime after the Sun Devils forced K-State into 16 turnovers. The Cats shot 52 percent but hit just 2 of 5 three-point shots. Wecker led the way with 12 points.

K-State would close to within five points several times during the second half, but Arizona State eventually pulled away 76-58. Wecker finished with 17 points. Amanda Levens led the Sun Devils with 29 points.

The loss dropped K-State's record to 3-1. The Cats will finish their trip in St. Thomas at 9:15 a.m. today against Western Michigan (2-3).

Before K-State's trip to the Virgin Islands, however, the team started its Thanksgiving break off cooking against IUPUI Nov. 20.

After the Cats drained 11 of 13 three-point attempts to enter halftime ahead 35-30, the game essentially was over.

"We were just rolling," freshman forward Kendra Wecker said. "When you're hot, you know it. We just get good, open looks off the passes that we give each other, and nice easy looks are a lot easier to knock down than when we're defended."

The Cats were led by center Nicole Ohlde, who scored 22 points and grabbed six rebounds. Wecker added 19 points, guard Laurie Kuehn had 16, forward Megan Mahoney had 13 and guard Kristin Bethman had 10.

In the first half, three Cats — Mahoney, Koehn and Bethman — were perfect from beyond the three-point arc.

More importantly, though, was K-State's balance between the perimeter and the paint, head coach Deb Patterson said.

"We did a nice job on penetration and kick. We made the next pass more often tonight," she said. "I thought we had a fair balance inside and outside with respect to our passing decisions — not necessarily scoring, but making sure the ball was inside and outside."

MIZZOU

great that we can come out on top like this and hopefully go to a bowl game."

That attitude was never more apparent than Saturday afternoon, as the Cats used a conservative defense to secure a spot in either the Insight.com or Mainstay Independence Bowl.

On offense, the Cats again struggled to find the right combination for much of the first half, converting on just two of six first-half drives to take a 10-0 lead heading into the intermission.

But K-State would find the right combination in the second half and after a Tiger holding call in the MU end zone made the score 12-0, the offense would rattle off 12 more points to extend the Wildcat lead to as much as 24 in the fourth quarter.

"We executed fairly well today, and obviously, with the weather we were playing in today, we weren't going to be real effective," junior quarterback Marc Dunn said. "We went out today and we wanted to minimize our mistakes and do as well as we possibly could."

Dunn, who took over quarterbacking duties for Ell Roberson after the sophomore was injured in the Cats' third drive of the first half, finished the game 10-of-18 through the air for 102 yards. And, most importantly, no interceptions.

"I think he did all right," Snyder said. "He didn't do everything that you'd like for him to do, but I'm not sure that anybody else did, either. We won, and he was the guy that was pulling the trigger."

However, it was K-State's time of possession advantage that might have meant the most in the larger scheme of things, as the Cats held on to the ball for almost eight more minutes than the Tigers, allowing K-State's defense to remain fresh for much of the game.

"It went back and forth in the first half," senior safety Jon McGraw said. "Coming out the third quarter, the offense did a good job of establishing the run game. They were probably the most consistent of the two offenses, and they did a good job of keeping the defense off the field."

That meant very few opportunities for the Tiger offense.

K-State's defense held Missouri to 317 yards of total offense and just 88 through the air, despite the Tigers' 192.6 yards-per-game passing average before the game.

"They're very balanced with what they do, and they tie boots in with everything they do," defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said. "So, it sort of became a guessing game, and we felt at halftime we sort of had a pretty good feel for how they were trying to attack us."

Missouri's only points of the contest came on a Brad Hammerich 39-yard field goal in the game's final seconds, but even that couldn't dampen the spirit of the Cats following the contest.

"We knew if we stuck together and worked as hard as we could, we could walk away and say, 'No regrets,' whether we made it or we didn't," McGraw said, "and that's what this team did."

since the injected DNA comes from a woman's reproductive system.

However, the scientists have been experimenting with injecting adult skin cells into the eggs as well.

In a separate experiment, the scientists showed they could push the development of human egg cells even further with a technique known as parthenogenesis. In that process, they said, six eggs reprogrammed themselves to develop into early embryos.

Such eggs would be largely compatible with the genetics of the egg donor.

The scientists described all the work as preliminary. Neither experiment has yet produced the coveted stem cells, master cells which grow into all kinds of body tissues.

Other research groups in this country and abroad have plunged into efforts for human reproductive cloning, which aims to produce a new person, or therapeutic cloning, which seeks only to create embryos that would yield stem cells for treating diseases.

And last September, a report from the National Academy of Sciences — an independent, congressionally chartered organization — said therapeutic cloning should be pursued.

Dr. Norman Fost, director of the bioethics program at the University of Wisconsin-Madison, said he believes a slippery slope argument for banning therapeutic cloning is a poor approach.

One could have made such a case against test-tube fertilization, which has turned out to be beneficial, and which also can be seen as a step toward cloning humans, he said Sunday.

The announcement by the Massachusetts researchers, he said, is a basic part of making stem cell research useful for human beings.

That, he said, is a path which the huge majority of the American people favor.

The researchers described their work as an important step toward producing stem cells to generate replacement cells as treatments for diabetes, heart disease, spinal injuries and many other ailments.

"We think we've shown that it's going to be possible, in the lifetime of many of us, to take a cell from our body and, by using cloning technology ... to take a patient's cell back in time using the egg cells, sort of a little time machine, and then making these cells that we've heard so much over the last few months, the embryonic stem cell, to make your own embryonic stem cells, young cells," said Michael West, president of Advanced Cell Technology.

But using human embryos for such work faces huge hurdles in Washington.

The president has made it clear that he is opposed to any type of human cloning," White House spokeswoman Jennifer Millerwise said.

SCAMS

groups that were brand new," he said. "The majority of them were with good intention. We're talking about an exception, not a rule."

Scamming people is not new. Weiner said, but the amount of money raised in a short time following the Sept. 11 attacks was unprecedented, making it easy for people to take advantage of little security.

Aileen Cray, executive director of the United Way of Riley County, said that although she has heard of the scams, she has received only one inquiry. She said she recommends people call the Better Business Bureau if they are worried about a charity.

"That has been out there always," she said. "There are unscrupulous people in the world who are going to do that. Sadly, the customer has to be aware. Any doubts, say, 'I don't think so.'"

Anderson also said awareness is vital and to remember these scammers sometimes are very well-informed.

"The con artists are smart," Anderson said. "They read newspapers. They find scams that make people say, 'Oh, yeah, I've heard about that.' They're not stupid people all the time."

"There are people out there who will do anything to get money."

Car accidents claim lives of 2 K-State students

BY DANA STRONGIN

Kansas State Collegian

Two K-State students were killed in motor vehicle accidents last week. Lance Christopher Donley, 21, and Jon Ryan ("J.R.") Loder, 23, were both seniors.

Loder was found dead the morning of Nov. 18 in what appeared to be a single-car accident involving his 1970 Buick Skylark. According to police reports, he lost control of the vehicle about one mile west of Marquette, Kan. The vehicle then hit a tree and became airborne before landing upside down in a river.

The funeral was Friday morning at Elm Lutheran Church in Marquette.

Loder was an agronomy student from Marquette. In the summers, he worked at Collingwood Grain, Inc. in McPherson, Kan.

"He was my intern for the last two summers," Gary Grasser, his supervisor, said. "He was always a joy to work with. He always had a smile."

Grasser said he had hopes for working with Loder in the future.

"He was an intelligent person," Grasser said. "I was looking forward to his working with us after graduating in December."

During the academic school year, Loder worked at K-State's Center for Basic Cancer Research.

"He was a wonderful young man, a very quiet man," said Terry Johnson, who worked with Loder.

"I went to his funeral on Friday, and what struck me was what was said over and over: He would sit and listen to everything you say and always have this big grin on his face. It was a very characteristic grin, and I think we can all envision it now."

Johnson expressed sadness for those who knew Loder.

"People will miss him dearly — not just his family and his friends at K-State, but also the people who worked in the lab with him," he said.

"It was a tragic loss, partly because he was so young and partly because he was so special," Johnson said.

Donley was an agricultural education student from Brookville, Kan. He was in an early morning car accident Nov. 21, the day before Thanksgiving. He was hospitalized and died the afternoon of the same day.

The funeral was Saturday morning at the Presbyterian church in Ellsworth, Kan.

"The funeral was packed," said Dr. Patricia Staver, assistant professor of secondary education. "He was a cowboy who loved working cattle and had great skills on horseback."

Someone had placed Donley's lariat with a spray of flowers on his casket, Staver said.

"His horse was at the cemetery," said Clark Harris, assistant professor of secondary education.

Donley was well-known by many of K-

State's education professors.

"Lance was a delightful young man and a strong addition to our class," Staver said. "He had a fantastic sense of humor."

Many of Donley's professors can recall special moments highlighting his ability to make others laugh and feel good about themselves.

"We will never forget when he taught a lesson on how to change a baby's diaper," Staver said. "Another lesson he taught was when he dressed up as a chef, brought buffalo meat to class and cooked hamburger and buffalo patties to compare the grease."

RCPD arrests Mimick for a.m. battery

BY DAN SMITH

Kansas State Collegian

Women's volleyball senior outside hitter Lisa Mimick was arrested at 3:45 a.m. Sunday for domestic battery.

Riley County Police Department officers arrested Mimick at her residence at 3:13 a.m. and detained Mimick under a $500 bail until 5:10 a.m.

Officials said Mimick will appear in District Court at 8:15 a.m. Dec. 11.

Mimick's arrest came after her selection to the All-Big 12 first team earlier Sunday evening.

Mimick, one of three seniors on head coach Suzie Fritz's team, averaged a team-best 3.35 digs per game in 97 games for the Wildcats this season.

The senior started all but one of the team's 26 matches during the season, and ranked second on the team in kills and total attacks and third in blocks. Earlier this season, Mimick became the sixth player in school history to tally 1,000 career digs.

K-State will play host to the University of Arkansas in the first round of the NCAA Tournament at Ahearn Field House on Friday. Mimick's status for the match was unknown at press time.

K-State Sports Information Director Doug Dull said the matter would be handled internally.

Analysts expect lower spending this Christmas

BY EDIE HALL

Kansas State Collegian

Economic concerns have been steadily increasing in the past two months.

Experts are expecting the start of the holiday shopping season to be an indication of where the economy is heading and how citizens are handling economic concerns.

"The Sept. 11 attacks haven't helped the situation any," Michael Oldfather, associate professor of economics, said. "We've seen so far that unemployment numbers for October are up about half a percent, and the National Bureau of Economic Research announced today that a recession began in March. Undoubtedly, Sept. 11 didn't help with a recession already on the way."

According to a survey sent to leading retail and real estate analysts by the International Council of Shopping Centers, analysts expect only a 1.1 percent increase in sales over last year's holiday shopping. This is considerably lower than the 3.4 percent increase they forecasted for the 2000 holiday shopping season.

"The first bits of information we've had indicate that retail sales won't be anywhere near to a normal year," Oldfather said.

"Unemployment and anxiety over the future is going to make it hard to find areas where consumer spending will increase

Hometown mentors

Stefanie Speer, freshman in open-option, helps Veronica Z. with an assignment on Monday afternoon at Woodrow Wilson Elementary School. As part of the United Way's Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc. program, Speer helps students with their class work.

Program works to provide children with role models

BY TREVOR BURGESS

Kansas State Collegian

Giving a child a mentor has been the goal of Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc. for 27 years.

Big Brothers-Big Sisters is a non-profit agency that offers a mentoring program to help local children of Manhattan.

Ken Scroggs, manager of Big Brothers-Big Sisters, said the agency matches children ages 17 and younger with adults in order to provide positive role models. Scroggs said it's important for some children to get guidance not only from their parents, but from other adults as well.

"Sometimes, when your parents tell you something, it's in one ear and out the other," Scroggs said. "But when someone else says it, for some reason, all of a sudden it's different. That's what mentoring is all about."

The mentors at Big Brothers-Big Sisters work on a volunteer basis with the children. They go through a screening process designed to assess the volunteer's strengths, abilities and suitability as a Big Brother or Big Sister. Scroggs said this is valuable when matching the mentor with the child. He said most of the Manhattan volunteers are students at K-State.

"The percentage of mentors in their 20's is very high, but that is good," Scroggs said. "We would like to see more community and local people involved as well."

Stefanie Speer, freshman in open-option, said she has been mentoring her little sister since October and the experience has become one of her favorite things to do during a week.

"I have never worked with kids a lot before and the program has really changed my attitude," she said. "It has given me a passion for kids."

Speer said she spends several days a

"On a typical day we spend 20 to 30 minutes on the playground," she said. "Then I help her with some class work she has had some trouble in. I kind of tutor her."

Officials hope new Walgreens will trigger future developments downtown

BY TARA PATTY

Kansas State Collegian

Walgreens is scheduled to make its Manhattan debut in May with the opening of a new store at Third Street and Bluemont Avenue.

The construction of the store should begin in a few weeks and be finished in time for a May opening said Michael Polzin, spokesman for Walgreens.

"We think we can bring a new level of service to drugstore customers and a convenience to drugstore retailing," Polzin said.

In addition to the pharmacy and a drive-thru pharmacy, Polzin said the store will offer over-the-counter remedies, cosmetic and beauty supplies and convenience food items. He said the store also will feature a photo finishing service, including both one-hour and next day.

"We want to raise the level of drugstore retailing in the area," Polzin said.

Because Walgreens is being built adjacent to a residential neighborhood, the architecture of the building will include an ornamental fence to make the commercial building fit into the residential architecture, said Eric Cattell, assistant director for planning for the city of Manhattan.

"We'll end up with Long John Silver's and the new Walgreens balancing the block, and the two businesses will share parking," Cattell said.

The H.T. Paul company is responsible for clearing the area and building the structure the Walgreens company will lease, Polzin said. In order to build the edifice, the company had to go through the process of having the area rezoned.

"The east part of the block was zoned commercial and the west end of the block was zoned residential," Cattell said.

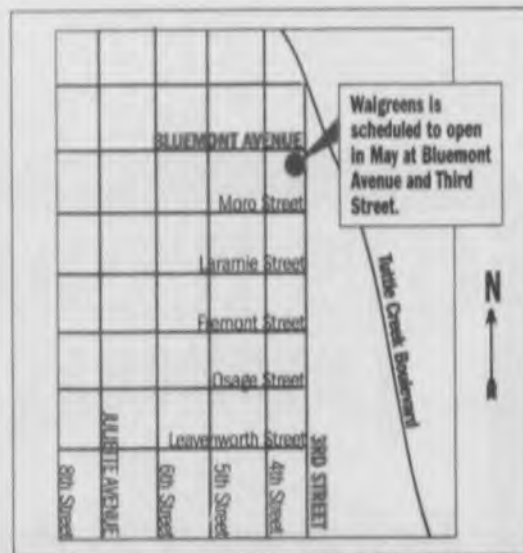

The H.T. Paul company procured the land for the site, then acquired a zoning change which allowed more flexibility with the site plan for the potential customers and more protection for the community, Cattell said.

"Walgreens will bring in neighborhood services to the neighborhoods on the east end of the community and more convenience on the west side of Tuttle Creek Boulevard," Cattell said.

The location will be within walking and biking distance, which Cattell said was in line with development trends on a national level.

"New urbanism is going back to how development was at the turn of the century when neighborhoods were developed with businesses close by," Cattell said.

The location of the building also might help facilitate the addition of more businesses, which is the aim of "Downtown Tomorrow," a plan for development of downtown Manhattan.

Chelsea Schmidt/Collegian

Cattell said after the completion of the mall and the streetscape of the 1980's, the city needed a new direction for the development of Manhattan.

NATION IN BRIEF

By The Associated Press

Bush denounces use of embryos to clone humans

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bush on Monday decried a research company's claim to have cloned the first human embryo. "We should not, as a society, grow life to destroy it," Bush said.

The president told reporters during a Rose Garden appearance that the reported breakthrough by a Massachusetts research firm was "morally wrong, in my opinion."

Bush previously stated his opposition to such research and said Monday that he hasn't changed his position.

"The use of embryos to clone is wrong," he said. "We should not, as a society, grow life to destroy it, and that's exactly what is taking place."

Presidential spokesman Ari Fleischer said the work of Advanced Cell Technology in Worcester, Mass., amounts to human cloning and lays bare "the conundrum of scientific progress, where progress can also be measured in terms of how many lives will be taken to save a life. That's something the president has drawn a strong ethical line in the sand on and said that line should not be crossed."

Advanced Cell Technology announced Sunday that its researchers had cloned a six-cell embryo in hopes of developing genetically compatible replacement cells for patients with a range of illnesses.

The Massachusetts company's lab procedure would be banned under anti-cloning legislation passed earlier this year by the House but stalled in the Senate.

President: Economy needs stimulus to end recession

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bush said the recession, officially declared Monday, should act as a clarion call for Congress to quickly approve an economic stimulus plan.

The president said he was aware of the economic problems almost as soon as he took office, and that's why he advocated the tax cuts approved earlier this year.

His spokesman, Ari Fleischer, contended that without those cuts, "The recession would be deeper, the recession would probably be longer."

Marines in Afghanistan to search for al-Qaeda leader

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The risk of U.S. troop casualties in the war on terrorism rises with the landing of Marines in Afghanistan to help in the hunt for Osama bin Laden.

"This is a dangerous period of time," President Bush said Monday. "America must be prepared for loss of life."

He commented on a day when a CIA operative remained unaccounted for in Afghanistan and the Pentagon announced five service members had been hurt by a U.S. bomb.

Though there have been injuries and accidental deaths, no American military commandos have died while fighting alongside anti-Taliban forces — sometimes under heavy fire — in the seven-week-old war.

The 1,000 Marines being deployed this week are more than double the American troops who were already on the ground in Afghanistan, an increase that will raise the possibility of casualties. So will the work they will be doing after weeks dominated by airstrikes.

Students following world events in wake of Sept. 11

After nearly three months, the war on terrorism continues, and students at K-State have noted a change in their interaction with the news and world events.

Stephanie Higgins, resident assistant in Goodnow Hall, said she has noticed a change in her residents since the tragedy.

"I've noticed that people are more in tune to the news and more likely to go to Web sites like CNN.com," Higgins said.

She also said more people in the Kramer Dining Center have been crowding around the news while they are eating.

"I hear more people talking more about current events than they would have before," Higgins said.

So, while the war rages on and many uncertainties face the nation, students can continue to tune in to their televisions for answers to their questions.

Crystal Stice, freshman in business management information systems, said she has noticed an increase in student interest of current events.

"Sometimes I feel there's too much and we need to go on with our lives, but to a point it is part of our lives," Stice said.

Joel Buckley, junior in management information systems, said while he has not had time to keep frequent updates on the tragedy, he also has noticed an increase in television viewing among his peers.

Buckley said that's why the media is handling the situation appropriately, some people are becoming obsessed with watching news programs.

"I think we definitely should be worried, but some people are becoming a little too worried about every little thing," Buckley said.

Manhattan Arts Center hires former McCain technician

BY THERESA BECKER
Kansas State Collegian

The Manhattan Arts Center has a new director, and K-State has one less employee.

Terri Lee, public program and performance manager for McCain Auditorium, took over as the arts center director last week. Lee said her new job includes things from day-to-day business to assisting the board of directors with fund-raising.

"I don't plan to make any drastic changes," Lee said. "I would like to see a bigger profile in community activities."

Lee said one of the functions of the center is to offer classes, which she will be responsible for helping to coordinate. The center offers a variety of classes, including dance, theater and art, as well as a poetry writing group. Lee said helping organize those will be part of her job, along with grant writing.

"I'll help the board with fund-raising, and they will help with grant writing," Lee said. "Grant writing is going to be my task."

Lee, who left her job as technical director for McCain to come to the arts center, said she's had an interest in the center for a while. Lee's duties at McCain included assisting in the organization of road shows and stage setup.

"I'd worked with the art center while I was still in school," Lee said. "It's a job I've been interested in for quite a while."

The position has been open for seven months, said Penny Senften, interim director and arts center board member.

Senften, a self-employed freelance translator, said her job flexibility and position as a board member were the factors in her accepting the temporary job.

"I was on the board, and I've been pretty involved with this whole organization for quite a few years," Senften said.

Senften said that while working as the director, the volunteers she's worked with have been very helpful.

"It's been a wonderful experience because people have really stepped up and done more than volunteers used to do," Senften said.

While looking for a candidate to fill the vacant position, Senften said they looked for someone with good organization skills and who had the ability to perform many tasks. But first, the person had to enjoy the arts.

"Good management skills and a strong interest in the arts. You really have to have a solid interest in the visual arts," Senften said.

Senften said fiscal management and overseeing committees are a large part of the job.

"Making sure everything gets paid and making sure the committees do what they need to do is the bulk of the work load," she said.

The committees can function well on their own, Senften said, but at a certain point they need help from an experienced leader.

"That's where the need for good organizational skills really comes into play," Senften said. "Those are the traits that Lee has."

Military forces in Afghanistan work to alter Taliban's movements

BY ROBERT BURNS
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The mission of the U.S. Marines in Afghanistan is to cut off escape routes for Taliban and al-Qaeda leaders, pinpoint targets for airstrikes and conduct quick strikes when the chance arises.

At a Pentagon news conference, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Monday the Marines have been sent in to help pressure the Taliban forces in Afghanistan, to prevent Taliban and al-Qaeda terrorists from moving freely about the country.

He said the Marines would number in the hundreds, not thousands.

Others said about 1,000 Marines would be involved. The last time that many had been put on the ground in a war zone was in the 1991 Gulf War, although Marines played a role in Somalia in 1993 as well as in Balkans peacekeeping operations.

The Pentagon, meanwhile, said five U.S. military members suffered serious injuries Monday when a U.S. attack plane mistakenly dropped a bomb on them near Mazar-e-Sharif in northern Afghanistan. A Pentagon statement said the injuries were not life-threatening and the five were being evacuated to Landstuhl Medical Center in Ramstein, Germany. Their names were not released.

Rumsfeld was reluctant to discuss the Marines' role in detail, but it appeared they may not be a traditional ground force that seeks contact with enemy troops — like the Marines' Gulf War push into Kuwait to oust an occupying Iraqi army.

Instead, after establishing their base in the vicinity of Kandahar, they might focus mainly on blocking roadways leading away from the city, rather than assault the city itself in search of fighters. In this way, they could make it harder for enemy forces to resupply, regroup or escape across the Pakistani border.

In an early indication of their role, Marines attacked an armored column with Cobra helicopters

Monday night in the vicinity of their new base. It is the Marines' training in the coordinated use of ground and air power that makes them especially useful in this kind of war.

The Marines also emphasize special operations missions including hostage rescue, demolition, counterterrorism and recovery of downed aircraft.

They join several hundred U.S. Army and Air Force special operations troops who have been working alongside anti-Taliban forces throughout Afghanistan — most effectively in the north — for weeks.

Gen. Tommy Franks, commander of U.S. forces in Afghanistan, wanted the Marines in southern Afghanistan as part of a broader strategy of blocking roadways, Rumsfeld said.

Rumsfeld stressed that the Marine base could be used for a variety of missions.

"You could use it for humanitarian purposes. You could use it for special operations. You could use it, as some of the questions have suggested, for the inflow of additional troops," he said.

Marines have flown F/A-18 and EA-6B Harrier attack missions over Afghanistan from carriers in the Arabian Sea, and they recovered a downed U.S. helicopter in Pakistan, but this is their ground combat debut in Afghanistan.

An initial group of about 500 Marines arrived at an airfield near the southern city of Kandahar, and a like number were to join them, officials said. They flew from Navy ships in the Arabian Sea and are members of two Marine Expeditionary Units — the 15th from Camp Pendleton, Calif., and the 26th from Camp Lejeune, N.C.

Each Marine Expeditionary Unit has about 2,100 Marines aboard ships. About half of them are ground troops; the rest are aviators, support forces and command elements.

Rumsfeld said Franks believed it would be useful to have a fixed base in the south rather than rely strictly on in-and-out special operations troops. Kandahar is the last main Taliban and al-Qaeda holdout in Afghanistan, although there are still pockets of resistance elsewhere; both Rumsfeld and President Bush made a point of saying Monday that the fighting there is far from over.

"This is a dangerous period of time," Bush said. "This is a period of time in which we're now hunting down the people who are responsible for bombing Americans. I said a long time ago, one of our objectives is to smoke them out and get them running and bring them to justice. We're smoking them out, they're running, and now we're going to bring them to justice."

The Senate Armed Services Committee's top leaders told reporters Monday that U.S. military officials are offering different estimates of how long it will take to destroy the al-Qaeda network. Sen. John Warner, R-Va., and Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., said the estimates range from weeks to months.

Warner and Levin spent last week visiting U.S. troops in Uzbekistan, Pakistan, Oman, Bosnia and Hungary.

The K-State Women's Volleyball team will play host to the first and second rounds of the women's volleyball NCAA Tournament this Friday and Saturday at Ahearn Field House. K-State will be one of 16 hosts for the first and second rounds of the tournament.

This is only the second time in K-State history that K-State has chosen to be host to the Tournament. The women's volleyball team has had a tremendous season. This fall they finished third in the Big 12 and set the school record for conference wins in a single season. They have the season-best seven-match winning streak.

With the hard-hitting volleyball action, it is important now, more than ever, to catch a match Friday or Saturday. Now that the football season is coming to a close, in between basketball games, take some time to attend a volleyball game. The team has worked and played incredibly hard this season.

We should take the time to cheer them on to a possible NCAA Tournament victory.

SENSITIVE MESSAGES

Entertainment industry right to censor itself after attacks

In the days following Sept. 11, Americans were shocked, saddened and confused. We shared our grief with one another and sought answers. Throughout the experience, the national media establishment did its utmost to help us through the grieving process.

The entertainment industry showed special sensitivity to the needs of a bewildered public. Within hours of the terrorist attacks, a huge number of entertainment executives announced plans to change advertising campaigns, delay movie release dates and edit radio playlists in deference to the victims and survivors of the attacks as well as the American people at large.

The changes in the entertainment sector include Columbia Pictures' pulling of the "Spider Man" trailer from theaters and the cutting of scenes from the film. This decision was made because the trailer included a shot of Spider Man spinning a web between the World Trade Center towers in New York.

A less obvious move was the elimination of certain songs from radio playlists. Clear Channel Communications (which owns 150 radio stations nationwide) suggested that its stations pull certain songs from playlists as a sign of respect for the victims of Sept. 11. The songs included "It's the End of the World" by R.E.M., "Crash Into Me" by the Dave Matthews Band, and all Rage Against the Machine songs. The list was suggested, not mandated.

Some critics strongly disagreed with these actions. They said the entertainment industry's efforts to do the right thing were tantamount to censorship. These critics were overlooking a very important factor in the decision of entertainment executives: respect for the dead and their loved ones.

The entertainment sector's changes were made to honor the value and sanctity of human life. They also were made because our nation was in mourning for the dead. It would have been callous and insensitive to continue showing the "Spider Man" trailer and playing songs about crashes and destruction following such a frightful tragedy.

Certainly, some of the actions taken by entertainment executives may seem trivial and useless. For instance, many people have questioned the inclusion of Louis Armstrong's "What a Wonderful World" on Clear Channel Communications' list of songs to be taken from playlists.

While this specific decision might not have been a good one, it was better for radio executives to remove innocuous songs from a playlist than accidentally include offensive ones.

I would say the list was fairly successful, considering its intended purpose. It wasn't perfect, but at least it was an honest attempt to honor the dead and avoid hurting the survivors.

One important question remains: did the entertainment industry have a right to censor itself? Despite what some paranoid First Amendment activists would have you believe, the answer is yes.

You see, the First Amendment works both ways. It gives both the freedom to express oneself and the freedom to avoid expressing oneself. If the entertainment industry thought it best to censor itself, it was certainly within its rights to do so.

Entertainment executives made these decisions because it was the right thing to do. They did, however, have an ulterior motive. Self-censorship was not just sensitive; it was also smart. Failure to act would have cost the industry millions of dollars in lost revenue. The American people would have noticed the lack of respect for the dead and spent their money on something else.

Was it best for the entertainment industry to censor itself after Sept. 11? You'd better believe it. Did they have the right to do so? Unquestionably.

At worst, the recent self-censorship might have been a slight blow to artistic expression. In America, however, art takes a back seat to capitalism. More importantly, it takes a back seat to respect for the dead.

Censoring music, movies will not help U.S. recover

The entertainment industry has decided since the World Trade Center attacks it knows what is best for the American public.

Apparently, the same executives who bring us blood-and-guts horror movies, Eminem and Fear Factor feel having those two beautiful towers in our movies, videos, radio and TV shows is too much for us.

After Sept. 11, discussion of the towers has been very difficult for many people. The loss America suffered that day is unprecedented.

Out of respect for the families and friends who lost someone in the attacks, the entertainment industry has been sensitive to those losses. Now, more than two months later, this sensitivity is bordering on censorship.

The first and most egregious example of media censorship was the now-infamous Clear Channel list of "questionable songs" released after the attacks.

Many of the songs on the list were understandably bothersome right after the attacks, such as Dave Matthews Band's "Crash Into Me," or Lynyrd Skynyrd's "Tuesday's Gone."

But what about Elton John's "Bennie and the Jets," or the classic Tramps hit "Disco Inferno?" Even Louis Armstrong's touching song, "What a Wonderful World," was deemed potentially insensitive.

One noticeable omission from that music list is Outkast's "Bombs over Baghdad." I assume the Clear Channel executives didn't think it would offend anyone they are concerned about.

Now Hollywood has gotten into the mix, delaying the terrorist-laden Schwarzenegger flick "Collateral Damage" indefinitely. The release dates for "Big Trouble" and "The Time Machine" both have been pushed back so the World Trade Center could be digitally removed from scenes.

The trailer to the soon-to-be-released "Spider Man" movie, in which he casts a large web between the two magnificent trade towers, also was pulled, leaving the audience to wonder where the cutting of material will end.

Taking the towers out of movies won't let us forget the tragedy.

This wave of speak no evil, hear no evil, see no evil has even toppled the barricades of the haven for open-minded candor, "Politically Incorrect" with Bill Maher.

A couple months back, Maher made an off-hand comment about the U.S. being "cowards lobbing cruise missiles from 2,000 miles away. That's cowardly."

Ari Fleischer, White House press secretary, responded, citing his comments were a terrible thing to say, which I agree with. Then, he said "all Americans ... need to watch what they say, watch what they do, and this is not a time for remarks like that. There never is."

Is there never a time to question government policy? When did free speech become socially unacceptable? Do we limit free speech to only a discussion of things we want to hear?

After such a landmark tragedy, there is a line of sensitivity we should be aware of. But it should not be the rule we measure our speech by from now on.

There are people who believe the U.S. deserved to be attacked. If we censor their speech, the terrorists win because we have become what we've fought to protect against. To borrow a line from "The Siege," do we shred the Constitution just a little? Bend it just enough to fit our needs?

We must not give in to such temptations and alter our way of life.

Singer-songwriter Ryan Adams deserves public praise for the video "New York, New York." The video, shot Sept. 7, features the towers in the background. On his Web site he said he wanted the video to be a reminder of life before the attacks.

Including the towers in silver screen thrillers and music videos would serve as a tribute to the glorious monuments they once were and hopefully will be some day. We should celebrate them, not hide them. Censoring what Americans have to see, say and hear won't make the memory go away. Taking songs off of the radio, censoring free speech and editing movies will only lower us to the levels of those individuals who chose to kill over 4,000 American citizens. As tempting as it may be to bend the rules just a bit, America is better than that.

The show must go on.

University's passenger van policy needs amendments

Editor,
In April, 2001, the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA) issued a safety letter to K-State, other universities and state/government motor pools warning against possible rollover of fully loaded 15-Passenger vans at high rates of speed. Various tests were cited where the NHTSA test driver stopped testing below 60 mph (maximum test speed) due to safety concerns.

On Aug. 24, after five months of deliberation, K-State published Chapter 6450 of the Policies and Procedures Manual, Van Policy on Usage of 15-Passenger Vans. The policy allows 15-passenger vans to operate at 60 mph on rural roads and posted limits on major highways. Single drivers are authorized to drive up to 10 hours in a 24-hour period, with a mandatory 30-minute break every 4 hours. Drivers are required to complete the "Coaching the Van Driver II" safety course, prior to van operation.

The K-State policy does not fully comply with the NHTSA report's warnings. Only 15-passenger vans are addressed when all of K-State's vehicles should be included as NHTSA's test reports indicate rollover hazards for all vehicles at high speeds. Single drivers are allowed to drive too fast and for too long. At 70 mph, the single driver could cover 700 miles with a total of an hour break in 11 hours of driving. If pressured to drive to meet a deadline, and without another safety course certified operator, the single driver is clearly set up for a fatal failure.

The following amendment to Chapter 6450 would greatly increase safety:

1. Reduce the maximum speed for all K-State vehicles to 55 mph on rural roads.
2. Reduce the maximum speed for all K-State vehicles to 65 mph on major highways except for all full-size passenger vans, which would be limited to 60 mph.
3. Limit the single driver to 350 miles, with no more than eight hours of operation, with mandatory 20-minute breaks every two hours, in a 24-hour period.
4. Require two safety course certified drivers for all road trips exceeding 350 miles.
5. Restrict the maximum passenger capacity of all vehicles to 80 percent of that suggested by the vehicle's manufacturer.

K-State has an excellent history of non-fatality accidents. By slightly amending Chapter 6450, an additional step would be taken to secure our future.

LOCAL TALENT

Kelsey Roach, belly dancer

ROACH

Kelsey Roach, junior in family and consumer sciences, has been belly dancing for three years and has choreographed a piece for this year's Winterdance.

Roach began dancing at the age of five and she continued off and on through middle school and high school. She since has taken several dance classes at K-State. She said they are different from other classes because they are stress-relieving instead of stress-inducing.

Belly dancing was a form of dance introduced to her by a friend. She said she enjoys it because the beginning levels are just as physically effective on the body as more advanced dancing.

The piece Roach put together for Winterdance is more than four minutes long. Roach said she has been working on the choreography for the last two months. Working out the piece has been difficult because belly dancing usually relies more on improv, and setting specific moves to specific times in the music is a challenge.

Roach said the colorful dance will be a crowdpleaser, and she is glad to be doing the dancing she enjoys most.

"I love belly dancing because I take other kinds of dance and I'm just mediocre at them, but I picked up belly dancing really quick," she said. "It's what I'm good at, and I enjoy it."

Deaths, tragedy mark changes in industry

BY JJ DUNCAN

Kansas State Collegian

This year has impacted the future of music in many ways. From deaths of musicians to changes in the industry itself, changes are taking place in music. Here is a recap of some of the most important events that affected music in 2001.

Feb. 12, 2001

The Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals made the ruling that killed Napster.

The popular Internet-based file-sharing program became heavily filtered to block copyrighted material from being distributed through Napster. By July 2, the company had to completely shut down the system to block the downloading of such material.

This event spawned the creation of numerous file-sharing programs such as Audiogalaxy and Morpheus. Though the most popular program has been obliterated, new programs continue to allow file-sharing. Internet radio stations have also become more popular after the shut-down of Napster.

The company since has announced plans to eventually put in place a subscription-based program to continue their electronic music distribution legally.

April 15, 2001

Legendary and influential punk rocker, Joey Ramone, lead singer of The Ramones died of lymphatic cancer at the age of 49.

Born Jeffrey Hyman on May 19, 1951, Joey Ramone has been cited by literally hundreds of bands as a large influence. The band began its over-30 year career in 1974 in New York City and went on to record such singles as "I Wanna Be Sedated" and "Blitzkrieg Bop."

Rob Zombie now is in the production seat of a Joey Ramone tribute album. He has said it hopefully will be available by the anniversary of the rocker's death.

Aug. 26, 2001

Hip-hop star and actress Aaliyah died in a plane crash, in the Bahamas, at the age of 22.

Aaliyah was shooting a video in the tropics when her plane crashed shortly after takeoff, killing all nine onboard. A memorial fund was established after her death to benefit victims of breast cancer.

She was mourned publicly by many musicians and fans.

Sept. 11, 2001

The date says it all.

The music industry has felt the effect of the terrorist attacks that brought down the World Trade Center in New York City. Many bands postponed album release dates to edit lyrics, song titles or album art that might be considered offensive in light of the attacks.

Bush was one of these bands. They changed their album art from a flying plane to a plain gold cover and changed the name of their first single from "Speak Kill" to "The People That We Love." Even lyrics in the song "Headful of Ghosts" were nearly changed because they mentioned the terrorist inside.

A list of banned songs was released soon after the event that urged radio and television stations not to play certain songs and videos that would be considered insensitive by some parties.

Benefit concerts and albums have also swamped America in every form from the national to the local level. Labels and independents all have released albums to benefit victims of the terrorist attacks.

2 Cats earn All-Big 12 selections

BY DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Even before K-State's volleyball team learned of its NCAA Tournament bid Monday afternoon, players and coaches already had reason to celebrate, as two of its players had been counted among the Big 12's finest.

Seniors Liz Wegner and Lisa Mimick were named to the All-Big 12 Volleyball first team Sunday afternoon, after leading the Cats to a 19-7 mark this season.

"It couldn't happen to two better people, and they have been the cornerstone of Kansas State volleyball the last four years — the most successful class ever to be at Kansas State for our volleyball program," first-year head coach Suzie Fritz said.

Sunday's announcement marked the fourth straight year that two Wildcat netters earned a spot on the 13-player squad, voted on by the conference's coaches. Wegner also became only the fourth player in Wildcat history to earn the honor twice during her career after being named to last year's team.

"It's a great honor to get, and it says a lot for our team and where we've gone and what we're going to do in the future," Wegner said. "It's a great honor to get your senior year and it means a lot."

It might have meant even more to Mimick, though. It was the senior's first selection in her career, after averaging a team-best 3.55 digs per game and finishing second to Wegner in kills and total attacks.

"It's kind of a relief. I've been kind of anxious to find out if I would get it or not, so it's a relief — it's a huge deal for me," Mimick said. "I come from a small town, and something like this is a huge accomplishment for me, so it's kind of a relief to go out on a good note."

The Wildcats also placed the second-most players of any team in the conference on the Academic All-Big 12 Team, released Nov. 19.

Wegner and Mimick joined fellow senior Jayne Christen, junior Jennifer Pollard and sophomores Lauren Goehring, Carl Jensen on the 42-member team.

"That's one of the things we're most proud of," Fritz said, "that academically, we can have the rigorous schedule that we have, and the travel that we have, as well as being able to place seven players on the first team Academic All-Big 12."

"That's the most we've ever had, and we're very, very proud of that. We know because we see them and we travel with them and they study on the road and they put their time in — there's a reason they're successful."

For Wegner and Christen, it was the second academic honor of the season, after the pair of seniors were named to the Verizon Academic All-District VII second team earlier this month.

"It just says a lot for the girls on the team and the quality of play that we have here at K-State and the quality of players we have here," Wegner said. "It's only going to get better."

Cats to play postseason regional in Ahearn

BY DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

The wait was a bit long for comfort, but the K-State women's volleyball team got what it wanted.

Although the Wildcats were one of the final four teams announced in the NCAA Tournament field of 64, senior Liz Wegner said the suspense was well worth it.

For just the second time in school history, Manhattan will be one of 16 hosts for the first and second rounds of the tournament, as No. 19 K-State (19-7) takes on Arkansas (21-11) on Friday at Ahearn Field House.

With a win over the Razorbacks, the Cats would face the winner of No. 2 Nebraska (27-1) and Oral Roberts (19-6).

"I'm shocked. I cannot believe that," Wegner said. "I mean, wow, down to the last little bracket, and we're hosting, and Nebraska's coming here. I'm so excited."

"We are a great team at home. People need to come in here and take us seriously, and I think that's going to be a big advantage for us, especially having to play Arkansas and then Nebraska," Wegner said.

After winning 15 conference matches this season in the Big 12 — a single-season record — senior Lisa Mimick said thoughts of landing a host site in the tournament began to develop.

"We had kind of an idea after beating A&M, and then going down to beat Missouri like we did, we had the hope of hosting," Mimick said. "Then we asked the coaches, and the coaches said they would know whether or not we are hosting. Well, they all kind of avoided us most of the day, so we didn't think anything of it."

"We automatically thought we were just going to go to Nebraska, so it was a huge surprise, and a great one at that."

Head coach Suzie Fritz said the NCAA had intended on seeding the 16 host teams first, and then pairing the others by geographic location. So, the Cats' coach figured if K-State didn't host, they would end up in Lincoln, Neb., or at Colorado State.

But as it turned out, the Cats wouldn't have to travel at all.

"We had a pretty good indication that we would stay relatively close to home, but we're very pleasantly surprised that we're home, home," Fritz said. "This close to home is just tremendous."

"We've been on the bubble. We've been so close to having an opportunity to play the first couple rounds here for the past three years, and it's good that it's finally paying off a little bit. We got 15 wins, and we're making a statement in a very, very competitive volleyball conference."

Fritz is familiar with the Cornhuskers, but the Cats have battled Arkansas before. On Sept. 7, Wegner's 26 kills and 13 digs led K-State to a 3-1 victory over the Razorbacks to open the second annual Wildcat Classic at Ahearn.

"They're much improved from the last time that we saw them, and they had tremendous success in the SEC this fall," Fritz said. "So I'm sure they're a very different team than we saw in the beginning of September. We'll prepare for those guys first, and if we get another shot at the Huskers, we always welcome that challenge."

K-State, who makes its sixth straight appearance in the NCAA tourney, could also be peaking at the right time. One of a record seven Big 12 schools earning an invitation, the Cats head to the postseason on a seven-match winning streak.

"I think we're as hot as we've ever been going into the tournament," Fritz said. "Now, whether we can keep in going, stay on task, and take care of Arkansas first — that's going to be a concern — it's going to be up to them a little bit."

K-State's Jenny Pollard dives to return a ball against Kansas earlier this season at Ahearn Field House. Ahearn will play host to the first and second rounds of the NCAA tournament Friday and Saturday. File photo by Justin Hayworth/Collegian

K-State prepares for rematch with TSU

BY DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Tennessee State might not have been slated the toughest game on K-State's non-conference schedule a year ago, but the Wildcats won't be looking past the Tigers this season.

Nov. 28, 2000, was enough of a wake-up call.

In just the third game of last season, first-year head coach Jim Wooldridge's tenure in Manhattan, Nolan Richardson III's club nearly knocked off K-State on its home floor.

In fact, it took a late three-pointer by Phineas Atchison to send the game into overtime before the Cats could battle to a 69-67 victory.

The Tigers finished just 10-19 last year, and hail from the Ohio River Valley, but K-State (2-1) will be ready for a similar test when Tennessee State (2-0) travels to Bramlage Coliseum tonight for a 7 p.m. tip.

The visitors return eight letterman and two starters, including six-foot four-inch forward Kyle Rolston and sophomore guard Garrett Richardson.

In Tennessee State's two wins this season, Rolston has posted 23 points per game, while Richardson has added 13 points and five assists.

The Tigers are coming off a 101-78 victory over Evansville on Saturday night, in which they hit 11 of 23 three-pointers for the game and shot 65 percent from the field in the second half.

Meanwhile, K-State is in the wake of a 67-65 loss to Ole Miss on Saturday night, a game the Cats lost in the final 1.5 seconds of the contest.

But forward Travis Reynolds said the outing was a good one for Wooldridge's club, despite the end result.

"I think we're on the move up. That was a team that played in the Sweet 16 last year," Reynolds said after the game.

"They just lost one player, they've been on the road and won, and we battled real well tonight."

"We had some young guys step up, some newcomers step up and play real well, and I think as the season goes along, we can keep improving," said Reynolds.

To do that, though, guard Larry Reid said K-State can't always rely on second-half comebacks. The Cats have trailed at halftime in all three of their games this season.

"We just need to come out with that passion that we come out with in the second half," Reid said.

"I think if we come out with that at the beginning, we can jump on teams. We're just getting slow starts. I don't know what the reason is. I think we need to be more aggressive."

Women's basketball places 2nd in Virgin Islands hoops tourney

BY DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's women's basketball team wrapped up a successful trip to the U.S. Virgin Islands on Monday with a 91-62 win over the Western Michigan Broncos to lock up second second place at the Paradise Jam Women's Basketball Tournament.

The Cats (4-1) bounced back from a 76-58 loss to No. 21/25 Arizona State on Sunday night to hand the Broncos their fourth loss of the season, behind solid performances from freshmen Laurie Koehn and Kendra Wecker.

After hitting just 2 of 5 shots from behind the three-point line against the Sun Devils and shooting just over 50-percent from the field Sunday, the Cats returned to form on Monday, shooting a sizzling 62.7 percent and connecting on 14 of 22 opportunities against Western Michigan, including Koehn's 5-of-8 afternoon from beyond the arc.

But it was Wecker who would put up the best numbers for the purple, pouring in 20 points on 10-of-15 shooting and snatching a team-high six rebounds.

Three other Wildcats finished with double digits in scoring, and K-State had solid bench production, outscoring the Bronco reserves 28-11, including senior Kristin Rethman's 14 points on 5-of-6 shooting.

K-State led by 17 at the half and used a 73 percent second-half shooting performance to put the Broncos away for good and finish their holiday trip to St. Thomas 2-1. The Cats outrebounded Western Michigan 35-25 and committed two fewer turnovers than the Broncos in the contest as well.

K-State next returns to action this weekend in the Commerce Bank Wildcat Classic at Bramlage Coliseum.

The Cats will play the Grambling State Tigers at 7 p.m. Friday, after Idaho State and Harvard kick off the tournament at 5 p.m. K-State has never lost to the Tigers in five meetings, including the teams' match-up in the 1996 event, which the Cats won 72-62.

In fact, K-State has been close to perfect in its home tournament, winning the last three Classics and five of the last six.

the college students who they can be paired with.

"We have a big jump when the students get back," he said. "We went from 137 kids in July to 206 right now."

Volunteers at the program will spend a few hours a week with their little brother or sister doing activities they both enjoy. Scroggs said mentoring a child for at least one year is very important.

"Studies show that if you have a mentor and you only put them together with a child from 0-6 months, you really have done a worse job than if you never would have touched the child," he said. "The reason being, someone else has let them down, and now they feel you're doing it too."

Aside from one-on-one matches, Big Brothers-Big Sisters offers several other different types of matches. It offers anything from married couples being matched up with a child, to an entire family taking care of a child.

Scroggs said all people can put their children through the program, which does not cost the parents.

He said Big Brothers-Big Sisters sets up fund-raisers throughout the year to raise money for operations.

While some children are fine without Big Brothers-Big Sisters, Scroggs said it is important for people to realize which children are going to require the mentoring program.

"It's not like we believe every child needs to be here," he said.

"but there are those children that are not getting some of the support they need to develop the assets that will help them to go through life and do it well."

Speer said she has learned that even spending a small amount of time with her little sister has made a difference in her life.

"Getting to know her has been rewarding," Speer said. "Paying her attention and giving her love and friendship is such an important thing."

anytime soon."

According to the ICSC survey, 49 percent of all respondents used the word "disappointing" to describe the upcoming holiday season. The next highest response was "fair" with 35 percent of the votes, leaving 16 percent of respondents saying "poor" and zero percent saying "good."

Respondents were provided a space to explain their one-word characterization. Some said their choice was a result of declining consumer confidence and uncertainty surrounding the possibility of war.

Despite these reports, local store owners are still optimistic about the holiday shopping season.

"I'm anxiously optimistic," said Michael Pusker, store manager at J.C. Penney. "Sales didn't drop over the Thanksgiving weekend, and I think people are going to rally together and get closer to their families. I think it will be good."

Oldfather said what might be good for the country might not be in the best interest of every individual.

"Some may feel they need to be patriotic and take their money and plastic to the malls and spend," Oldfather said.

"However, there are going to be people unsure if they will be able to keep their job, or their bonus, and spending more may be risky to them."

"People need to be sensible with their money. If we all become too tight with our cash, it won't help the recession. But we can't expect people to do things that will be risky to their financial security."

special education, recalled Donley's skill in working with children.

"One past memory I have is from last week when he taught middle school students," she said. "He worked with a student who could not read very well, and he was so respectful of her."

"I watched how he worked with this student, and he prompted her a bit with encouragement and with modeling and with respect," Navarette said.

Harris regretted that Donley would never fulfill his goal to be a teacher.

"I feel bad for the profession that he is not going to be out there," he said. "He would have been an excellent teacher."

Donley was a member of the Alpha Gamma Rho fraternity. Fellow member John Green recalled his quirky side.

"He had a Winnie the Pooh bag he wore to class," he said. "And on St. Patrick's Day, he dressed as a leprechaun. He always had funny antics."

"Lance was caring, and he was one that always tried to help get everything finished," said Dr. Steven Harbstreit, associate professor of secondary education. "He was an outstanding individual that will be sadly missed."

Feelings of both regret and gratefulness accompanied those who knew Donley.

"I didn't get to know him well enough," Harris said.

"The way I see it, we were so lucky to have known him," Navarette said.

"The outcome targeted North Third and North Fourth Streets, South of Bluemont to Leavenworth, as a potential redevelopment area," he said.

The Walgreens would begin the process of providing redevelopment of the Third and Fourth street corridor as a continuation of the downtown area and do it in a way that was compatible to adjacent neighborhoods, Cattell said.

This redevelopment plan may also pave the way for new businesses to join the Manhattan community, including Target. According to Target spokesman, Brie Heath, the company is interested in Manhattan for a potential site, but nothing has been planned yet.

"Our real estate representatives look at 200-300 potential sites each year, nothing is sited in Manhattan just yet," Heath said.

KSU receives doses of influenza vaccinations

BY MICHAEL WATSON
Kansas State Collegian

Lafene Health Center has received 600 more doses of influenza vaccines.

"If it's anything like the first 150 we received, they're going to go fast," Clarice Holmes, clinic coordinator, said.

Holmes said a priority for the first shipment was given to high-risk citizens due to the possible nationwide delay of vaccine distribution according to the Kansas Department of Health and Environment.

"We still urge people that were in the high-risk group to come in to get vaccinated, but it is not limited to just them," she said.

Holmes said the vaccination process is quick. People wanting vaccinations must pay first at the business office. Then they take the receipt to the immunization room.

"There is a 20-minute wait after the

Flu shot availability

Flu injections will be given from 8:30 to 11:30 a.m. and 1 to 4:30 p.m. Thursday and Dec. 6 on a walk-in basis. They are available to any K-State student, faculty or staff member who wishes to be vaccinated. Cost for the vaccination is $7 for students and $10 for faculty and staff.

injection. That is the longest wait," she said. "By the time they pay and come back, we run them through pretty quickly."

There are 650 more doses coming, but Holmes said she does not know when Lafene will receive them.

Holmes said Lafene always is concerned about the flu season, but the virus is unpredictable. She said getting a flu vaccination will help students battle it.

"There are different strands, so you can still get the flu, but it won't be as severe as if you didn't get the vaccine," she said.

Kansas to gain new district lines

BY JOHN HANNA
The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Legislators are behind schedule in redrawing their own districts, but some believe they were too optimistic in predicting how quickly they could move on the politically charged issue.

The Special Committee on Redistricting began a two-day meeting Tuesday at the Statehouse. Its 34 members quickly broke into small groups, along party and regional lines, to discuss House and Senate districts for parts of the state.

The new district lines are supposed to reflect population shifts documented in the 2000 federal census. Johnson County and the Wichita metropolitan areas are likely to gain power, while southeast and northwest and north-central Kansas could lose clout.

The 15 House Republicans who serve on the committee hoped to have a proposal for new representative districts finished by Wednesday. The committee's eight Republican senators thought they would have a plan ready for Senate districts within three weeks.

The committee originally planned to have proposals ready for a vote Tuesday, so it could forward its maps to the entire Legislature, which convenes Jan. 14. But any votes by the committee aren't likely until its next meeting, Dec. 20 and 21.

Earlier this year, the committee established deadlines in hopes that the Legislature could deal with redistricting quickly. In 1992, partisan and regional bickering delayed passage of redistricting bills long enough that the state had to move its candidate filing deadline from June 10 to June 24.

But members said behind-the-scenes discussions among legislators about their districts have taken longer than anticipated, as did congressional redistricting in September and October.

"I don't know if we ever truly thought we could get it all done (Tuesday)," said Rep. Mike O'Neal, R-Hutchinson, the committee's co-chairman.

Senators typically acquiesce on proposals for redrawing House districts, just as representatives are supposed to stay out of Senate redistricting.

Eight Democrats from the House and three from the Senate serve on the committee, but they can do little more than argue publicly if Republicans are united on a plan.

Democrats are in their weakest position on redistricting in 40 years. The GOP 30 of 40 Senate seats and 79 of 125 in the House, and Gov. Bill Graves is a Republican.

In 1972 and 1982, Democrats Bob Docking and John Carlin were governor; in 1992, Democrat Joan Finney was governor, and her party had a 63-62 majority in the House.

In their first discussions with each other, Republicans were up-front about their desire to draft plans that help Republican incumbents retain their seats and make it easier for the GOP to capture open seats.

Theatrical group uses humor to send message of health

BY ADAM LEE
Kansas State Collegian

College life and all the problems that accompany it were spotlighted Tuesday night.

"Tiger by the Tail," a theatrical group that addresses issues that affect students on a day-to-day basis, was featured in the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

The performance was sponsored by Sexual Health

Awareness Peer Educators, S.H.A.P.E., as part of a week of events devoted to the upcoming World AIDS Day.

"Tiger by the Tail" is a group of students from Emporia State University who focus on peer education through acting. The group writes and performs skits that depict young people in difficult situations.

Through a combination of humorous and dramatic dialogue, the performers explore subjects ranging from substance abuse to superficiality.

Group member Pete Hardy said that through laughter they can expose people to subjects they might not normally talk about because they are personally or even embarrassing issues.

"Humor keeps the audience involved," Hardy said. "Then you can have a really dramatic ending."

Jokes were intermingled with information such as what to do if you have been sexually assaulted, resources for people with mental health problems and how to properly put on a condom.

"Tiger by Tail" member Mandy Shirk said she thought students could better appreciate the message their skits try to convey because often times they are based on the members' own experiences.

"I think that they can relate to us more on a personal level because we are students," Shirk said.

Shana Kerstetter, senior in family studies and human services, said she wasn't expecting the performance to be so comical and said she thought the group's style was effective in addressing serious social circumstances.

"They presented the information that they needed to, and it was also very entertaining,"

Kerstetter said.

The S.H.A.P.E. organizers said they thought "Tiger by the Tail" fit perfectly with their groups mission of increasing student awareness of sexually transmitted diseases.

"We want to teach our fellow students about healthy lifestyle choices, and we've learned that peer education is very efficient in doing that," said S.H.A.P.E. member Amy Mauk, senior in family studies and human services.

Mandy Shirk acts out the role of an unknowing victim about to be attacked by a stalker, portrayed by Pete Hardy, on Tuesday in the K-State Student Union Ballroom. The theatrical group, Tiger by the Tail, performed skits representing issues college students face such as campus safety and sexually transmitted diseases.

Hidden job market might be answer to college grad frustrations

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Corporations will hire 19.7 percent fewer 2001-02 college graduates than they recruited from last year's graduate pool, according to the National Association of Colleges and Employers' survey, Job Outlook 2002.

"Employers have indicated they are looking for more experienced candidates," said Tim Henderson, associate director of Career and Employment Services.

"In any time when there is a downturn in the economy, it's basically a buyer's market for employers. They have the luxury of looking at more experienced individuals."

Still it is beneficial for employers to look at hiring new college graduates, Henderson said.

"There are still a number of employers and companies that continue to recruit college graduates because they value and put an emphasis on having a fresh perspective," he said.

Between 10 and 15 companies, though, have either postponed or canceled this fall's on-campus visits.

While some companies already have submitted offers to candidates, he said others are experiencing hiring freezes, layoffs or a reduction in their recruiting budgets.

"I would like to emphasize that many of them have strongly indicated that they will be back on campus. If not this spring, they should return in the fall," he said.

Erin Galvin, senior in anthropology, plans to move to Arizona after she graduates this December. She has not found a job yet, but is pursuing human resources positions, Galvin said.

With a tight job market, she said she is not expecting to find her dream job immediately after graduation.

"I have bills — it terrifies you," she said.

"There are always jobs out there, though. It may not be something you necessarily want to do, but there's always something. You can't expect the perfect job to fall in your lap."

Companies should not cut back on their college recruiting, she said.

"I can't think of a valid reason they wouldn't hire more graduates," she said. "I think they are missing out on a variety of people and the new ideas that would be coming in."

She said she understands companies are looking for more experienced individuals, but she hopes ageism does not become an issue.

"I have worked my way through college, sometimes 40-60 hours a week," she said. "I have experience. Just because someone is older might not necessarily mean they have more experience than me."

Henderson said students should be aware of the cutbacks and start their job searches early.

"This requires immediate attention," he said. "This is not something that should be put off. It will require a greater level of diligence, persistence and creativity."

"For the past several years, college graduates have been extremely fortunate in having a healthy economy. There have been a lot of visible opportunities available to them."

Newspaper advertisements and Internet searches are examples of visible opportunities. Students need to go beyond this simple job-searching and utilize the hidden job market, he said, which is mainly based on referrals from people within the business.

He said the hidden job market accounts for two-thirds of all available job opportunities.

"In a poorer economy, students need to start networking with as many people as possible to tap into that hidden job market that is never publicized or advertised," he said. "A lot of employers don't advertise positions because they don't want a slew of responses from unqualified candidates."

"They prefer to have a referral from someone that knows the candidate. That's why networking is a crucial part of the search."

The outlook

The National Association of Colleges and Employers conducted a survey, Job Outlook 2002, from late July until mid-August. Survey results revealed that employers expect to hire 19.7 fewer 2001-2002 college graduates than 2000-2001 graduates.

The Good News

■ 39.9 percent of employers plan to continue their college hiring at last year's levels.
■ 30 percent plan to employ more graduates than during the 2000-01 academic year.
■ Government and non-profit organizations should boost their recruiting by 20.5 percent.

■ The job market should be strongest in the South. Employers plan to cut hiring by 7.3 percent.

The Bad News

■ 30 percent of employers plan to decrease college hires.
■ Service employers plan to cut back hiring by 24.2 percent.
■ Manufacturing companies plan on hiring 30.1 percent fewer grads in 2002 than in 2001.
■ The job market should be weakest in the West. Employers plan to cut hiring by 44.8 percent.
■ The Northeast and Midwest project cuts similar to the national average, 19.7 percent.

Liz Black utilized the hidden job market when her high school and college internships landed her a position as an engineer working on aircraft engines for General Electric in Winfield, Kan.

Black, senior in mechanical engineering, said she did not have to go through a formal application process, since her previous employers approached her with the offer in August.

"I was very relieved," she said. "Finding a job was not something I liked to think about. It's difficult to see my friends struggling, though, trying very hard to find jobs and coming back with not-so-desirable results."

She said there are about 30 mechanical engineering majors graduating this December. She said about four have found jobs, and seven are pursuing graduate school, but the rest still are job-searching.

"There are lots of people going out on interviews, but not many people are getting offers," she said. "There are not nearly as many openings. A lot of offers were made over the summer during their internships, too."

She said General Electric was eager to hire her because she had seven to eight months experience in the specific position, and her learning curve would be short.

"Overall, I have spent 18 months with the company," she said. "The company has invested a lot of time in me. For it to receive a return, it needed to bring me back long-term."

AROUND CAMPUS

Jessica Hammond will perform from noon to 1 p.m. today in the Union Courtyard as part of Lunchtime Lounge.

CAMPUS IN BRIEF

Union information center offers computer access

Students now can check their e-mail, watch TV, read the paper, search the Internet, use the telephone and see what's happening on campus all at one central location.

The campus information center, on the ground floor of the K-State Student Union, has been up for about a month and a half.

Union Director Bernard Pitts said the response has been positive.

"Fantastic," he said. "There's always someone down there on a computer. As people become more familiar with it, it becomes more used."

K-State's center is one of 24 across the country. The stations, designed by the California-based company Campus Link, are made especially for college campuses.

Advertisers pay for spots on the screen, which funds the center. Students do not have to pay for anything, Pitts said.

The center includes six Gateway computers, maps of the campus and the Union, room reservations in the Union, brochures for different groups and events on campus and 200 free copies of the Topeka Capital-Journal each day.

Pitts got the idea for the campus link after visiting UCLA's Student Union, which had the first one in the country.

"We tried to bring into one location all the information someone would want on campus," he said. "It's the only semblance of information on campus."

The televisions have been especially helpful recently, Pitts said.

"After Sept. 11, everyone was interested in what was going on in the world," he said. "We had our TVs turned to CNN."

STATE IN BRIEF

By The Associated Press

Hepatitis A cases decrease; last occurrence Oct. 26

HUTCHINSON — Encouraging results from aggressive immunization campaigns have health officials hopeful that hepatitis A outbreaks are under control in Hutchinson and Great Bend.

"Oct. 26 was our 88th case, and we've had none since then," said Judy Seltzer, director of the Reno County Health Department in Hutchinson. "I can't yet say it's totally over, because we need to go past the 50- or 60-day time limit for an exposure to show up. We're looking pretty good at this point."

In Barton County, it's been two weeks since the last case occurred.

Lily Atkins, director of the Barton County Health Department, said the county confirmed 13 cases of hepatitis A since the outbreak began in May.

"We're holding our breath that this is over," Atkins said.

The immunization campaign was aimed at those most at risk of contracting the liver disease—primarily users of illegal drugs.

NATION IN BRIEF

Danger increases as war takes change in Mid East

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The stepped-up pace of the war inside Afghanistan also means increased risks: A CIA operative remains unaccounted for, five soldiers are recovering from friendly fire and more casualties are likely with Marines on the ground.

In addition, the enemy is so dedicated to its cause that fighters are willing to have hand grenades wrapped around themselves and blow themselves up, so they can kill a half-dozen other people in close proximity, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said.

The thought that they'll surrender, Rumsfeld said, is not likely.

The increased danger was apparent Tuesday as some of the 600 Marines already setting up base at a remote southern airstrip began to set out on patrol in Humvees loaded with anti-tank weapons and heavy machine guns.

Transportation Department want checkpoints efficient

WASHINGTON, D.C. —

Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta wants to whisk airline passengers past security checkpoints in 10 minutes or less.

As the Transportation Department prepares to take over passenger and cargo screening at the nation's airports, Mineta said he wants to avoid long waits.

"Our goal in passenger screening is no weapons, no waiting," Mineta said Tuesday. "We will strive to develop a screening process that prohibits weapons or other banned materials—without requiring a waiting period of longer than 10 minutes."

Mineta also said the department wants to screen air cargo without delaying a plane's departure and plans to have several thousand air marshals on flights by June 1.

Sean McGivern, junior in political science, French and international studies; and Jennifer Domsch, sophomore in political science, have been elected chair and vice-chair of the Recreational Service Council.

The RSC is a policy-making organization. McGivern said the role of RSC is to incorporate student, faculty and staff opinions into the policies and procedures of Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex and programs it sponsors.

"I'm a consumer of the Rec's facilities and programs, and hands-on experience with the Rec will aid the council in making good decisions," McGivern said.

As chair of the committee, McGivern is responsible for leading council meetings and representing the council at other meetings where Recreation Services is involved. Domsch not only serves as vice chairman, but also as secretary. McGivern and Domsch, along with Raydon Robel, director of Recreation Services, make up the executive body of the council.

"I'm really excited to get started," Domsch said. "I wanted to get more involved on campus, and this was a really good leadership opportunity to fill."

Survey implemented to evaluate advising

BY RYAN DONAHUE
Kansas State Collegian

Students who enrolled for the spring semester online through KATS during the past few weeks were introduced to the university's first attempt to evaluate the effectiveness of the academic advising system at K-State.

A simple nine-question survey was put in place on the KATS system. The survey was the product of the K-State Advising Enhancement task force appointed by Provost James Coffman.

The goal of the survey—and the task force—was to come up with an effective mechanism where student input could be collected on a regular basis, Mike Lynch, associate vice president, said.

The survey was placed on the KATS system two weeks prior to the beginning of spring enrollment. It was only accessible online, and completion of the survey was not mandatory for enrollment. The completion rate for the survey exceeded Lynch's expectations.

"It's a tremendous data base. It beats a mail survey totally. By the end of the week, we will have approximately 14,000 students who completed the survey out of 18,000," Lynch said.

Any students who missed the online survey by using other methods of enrollment will be e-mailed the survey in the coming weeks. Lynch said he believes they will have up to an 85-percent completion rate by the end of the semester.

Initial concerns of the KATS system being overloaded by the survey proved to be false.

"To my knowledge, it did not prove to be a problem. I only received one e-mail from any student who had trouble with the survey. Out of the 14,000 survey entries, only 250 students opted out of the non-mandatory survey," Lynch said.

Crystal Borhani, sophomore in marketing, said she thought the survey was too simple.

"The questions were too basic," Borhani said. "If you had issues with your adviser, you would have taken it up with them already."

Borhani said she believes the mandatory advising appointment can prove to be more of a nuisance than an aid.

"It kind of screwed me up. I was late in getting my appointment and ended up missing my enrollment date by a few days," she said.

Lynch said the effectiveness of an adviser's role depends on what the student wants out of the session.

"If a student is wanting to receive advising on a career plan such as a five-year plan for their education, then it can prove to be a valued asset in achieving that goal," Lynch said.

"It is good to meet with your adviser, no matter what class you are in," said Robin Craig, graduate student in animal sciences. "They can remind you of some of the things most undergrads don't know about, like applying for graduation."

Craig earned her bachelor's degree at K-State and said she remembers when enrollment was a daylong affair.

"KATS is a lot easier. The old lines were awful. With the KATS system, you can enroll at home or in the K-State Student Union, and with the online catalog, you never even have to get up to enroll," Craig said.

Lynch said the reports of the data will be completed by late January or early February. Then, the task force will present an overall university report to the provost and college with college reports to each college head.

Individual department reports will be presented to each respective department head. All advisers with more than five advisees also will be eligible to have a personalized, anonymous report presented to them upon request to the associate vice president.

"Before this, there was no systematic way across the university to evaluate the adviser's role. Overall, we are very pleased with how smoothly it all worked on KATS. It was a success," Lynch said.

Bluemont students express sadness

BY SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

One young student at Bluemont School summed up the general feeling after learning her school would be closed.

"What am I going to do?" she asked Principal Lori Martin. "This has been my forever school."

Her response was not unusual. "We shed tears that morning," Martin said. "We wiped our eyes and made it a great day for our students."

The Manhattan School Board unanimously voted last week to shut down Bluemont and Eugene Field elementary schools in response to declining enrollment and looming budget problems.

Martin said many people were taken by surprise. "Folks didn't think it was a reality," she said. "It's a really harsh reality to deal with."

"It's been like a funeral home here. We've had parents come in to the office crying. We've had 14 flower deliveries."

For now, the staff is concerned with making things fun and normal for the students. The school won't be closed until June, and Dave Colburn, father of two Bluemont children, said it's important to maintain a healthy learning environment.

"It's going to be hard the next five or six months to keep the faculty riled up when they know their building is closing and they're going to another building," he said. Colburn, who lobbied the board to keep Bluemont open, said the community will lose a great asset by closing the school.

"There's something special here. It's not a number you can just quantify, though," he said. "It's an old building. Lots of steps. Lots of floors. We've got the cards stacked against us."

"What makes us special doesn't come across in those numbers."

But those extra steps played a big role in the final decision to close the school. Either Bluemont or Woodrow Wilson had to be closed, and the board cited the handicap accessibility as a major factor.

The building has four floors and no elevators. Almost all of Wilson is on one floor.

But the school has so much more to offer than its building structure, Lisa Stroble, president of the PTO, said.

"It's a pocket of excellence. It has great programs," she said. "It's touching a lot of kids — a lot of kids that need it."

Twenty percent of the students are minorities, and the school has the highest level of impoverished children in Manhattan.

Accommodating these students can sometimes be tough, but Martin said the teachers have done a good job of working with them.

"You have to be willing to work outside the walls of the school," she said. "Form relationships with the families."

Parental involvement and student volunteering are two things that separate Bluemont from other schools. There are 213 students and 239 volunteers, many of whom are K-State students.

The school has several

Bluemont also is the only school in Manhattan that offers free before- and after-school programs.

Because of its economic make-up and extracurricular programs, Bluemont receives about a half-million dollars in federal grants. Assistant Principal Jerry Armendariz said. He said he is not sure if the school automatically will lose those grants or if they can be transferred.

These programs help build students' characters, Stroble said.

"Bluemont is a place, while where it's definitely important to read," she said. "We want that no matter what role we have to play in the child's life."

The future of the Bluemont building has not been decided yet. It has been appraised at $632,000.

"There's the potential for it to be sold," Martin said. "It would be my hope that it would be used for educational purposes, though."

The board plans to redistrict Manhattan in December, so students should know what school they will be attending by January.

Stroble said she hopes Bluemont children can stick together.

"For a lot of kids, this is family. They've been together since kindergarten," she said. "The school and school programs are such a big part of some of the students' lives."

School board needs support during closings

We support the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 school district's decision to close Eugene Field and Bluemont elementary schools.

While the students, and parents and faculty might be inconvenienced by this verdict, we feel the school district made the best choice considering the circumstances.

Board officials said they voted to close the schools as a result of the declining enrollment during the last two years. Without closing the two schools, they would have lost $2 million and would have made serious program cuts throughout the district.

Board members said they chose the schools that would close based solely on the construction of the buildings and not the schools' performance levels.

We stand behind the board and its decision because although it might not appear so now, these cuts will strengthen the district. Underfunding is synonymous with education. This cut will channel the flow of money more effectively back into the school.

It is important for the community to stand behind this decision.

Knowledge boundary

Censored books deny reader valuable information; parents need to be monitors

I have always viewed a library card as a passport. It allows readers to go on adventures to places that are fictitious or factual — from the past to the future — all while remaining in the present.

Unfortunately, that passport that allows the wings of one's imagination to soar also carries a price tag — the occasional unjustifiable censorship.

Herbert N. Foer's book, Banned in the U.S.A., listed the 50 books that were frequently challenged throughout the United States in schools and public libraries in the early 1990s.

Some of those books included John Steinbeck's Of Mice and Men and The Grapes of Wrath. Also included were Madeline L'Engle's A Wrinkle in Time and poet Maya Angelou's autobiography, I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings.

According to the Web site www.booksatraz.com/censorship/banned.htm, Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm's Little Red Riding Hood also was banned, mostly because Red Riding Hood was carrying a bottle of wine in her basket.

Of course the list could not be complete without contributions from Samuel Clemens, a.k.a. Mark Twain. Two of his books, The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn and The Adventures of Tom Sawyer are some of the most banned books in history. The above-stated site pointed out that Twain wrote those books for adults, not for children. The site also mentioned those books often are banned because they are considered racist, even though they were written against slavery and racism.

Even 34 of the Modern Library's 100 Best Books of the Twentieth Century have been banned, or at least challenged, since their release. These include F. Scott Fitzgerald's The Great Gatsby and Anthony Burgess' A Clockwork Orange.

There is no need for censorship in regard to books. It represents the constraint of ideas. Author Judy Blume once said, "Let children read whatever they want and then talk about it with them. When parents and kids can talk together, we won't have as much censorship because we won't have as much fear."

With libraries and public schools still censoring books, it brings a sense of ignorance from our past. It is a way of establishing boundaries of knowledge that should not exist.

I remember reading a heavily censored book, J. D. Salinger's The Catcher in the Rye, as a sophomore in high school. It was shocking because it was so candid. The main character was a teen-ager named Holden. He did not use poetic words or optimistic phrases because it would have been out of character.

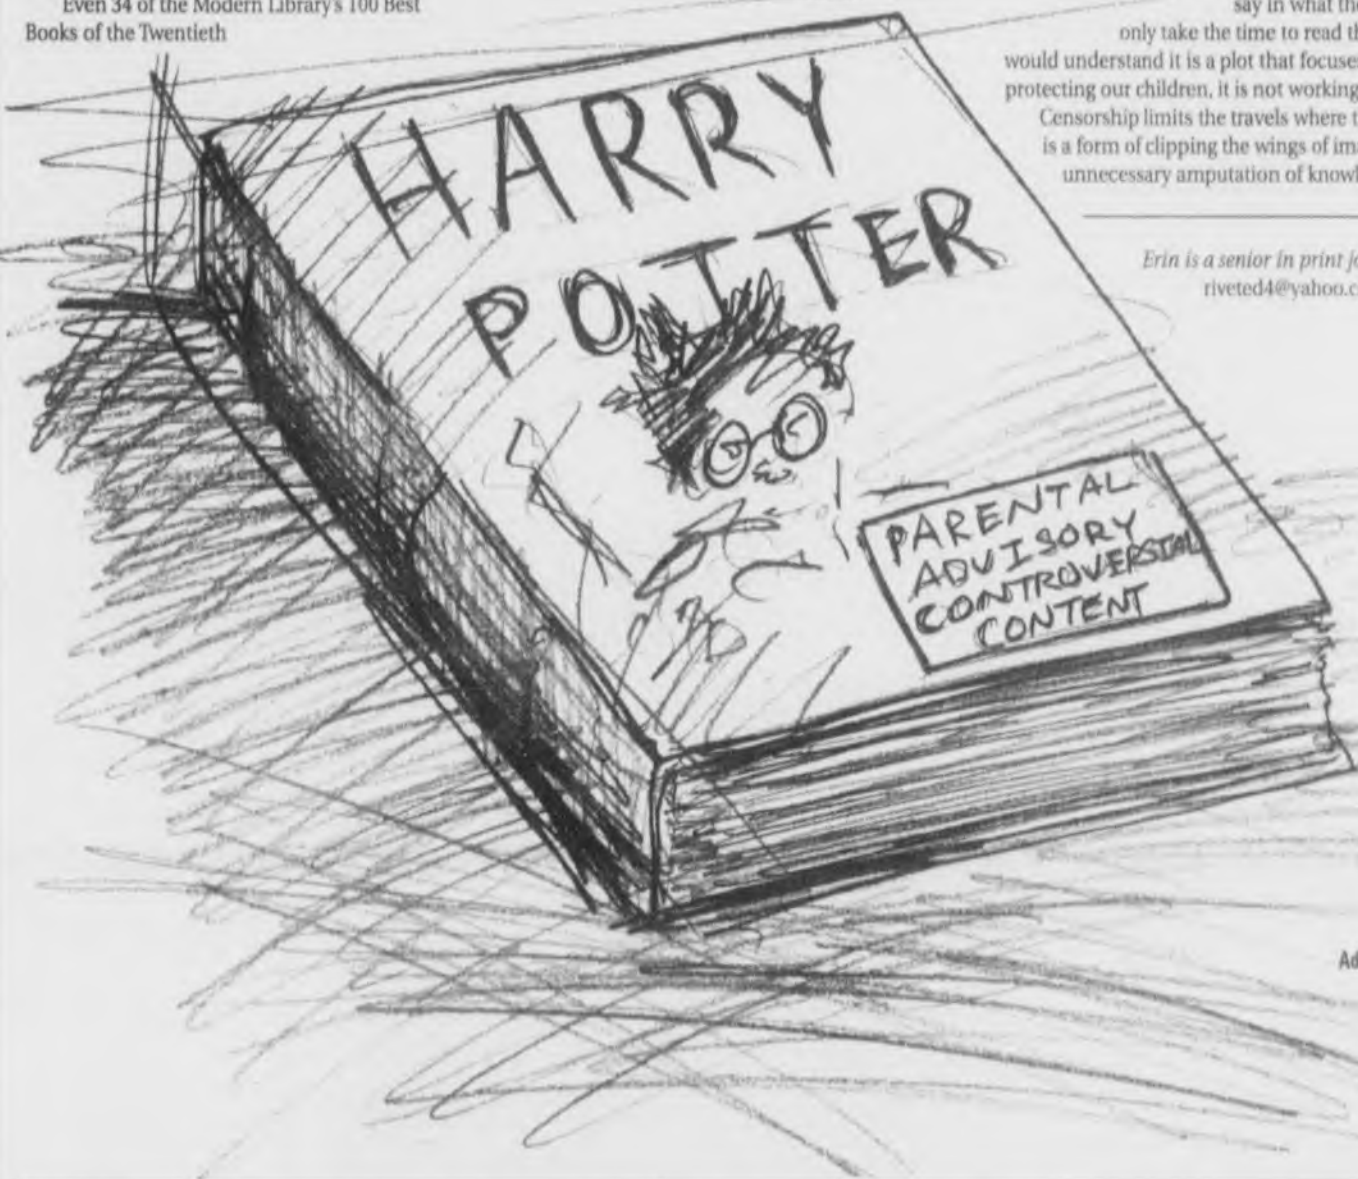

It was the first time I understood the main character of a book. Holden was real. His words were that of a teen-ager, lost in the confusion and chaos that is brought forth during the difficult time period of adolescence. Perhaps this frightened people, and so they censored this wonderful book.

Classics from the past are not the only books to be banned. Modern day literature is also being challenged. Last weekend I viewed "Harry Potter and the Sorcerer's Stone" with my family members, some of whom are elementary school teachers. They mentioned some of their students' parents forbid them to read any of the books or even see the movie because they deemed them inappropriate.

Granted, parents should have the final say in what their children view, but if they would only take the time to read these books or see the movie, they would understand it is a plot that focuses on imagination. If this is a form of protecting our children, it is not working.

Censorship limits the travels where the written word can take people. It is a form of clipping the wings of imagination and will result in the unnecessary amputation of knowledge.

New draft answer to distrust of government

I remember sitting and watching TV with my roommates Sept. 11. As images flashed on the screen, news organizations speculated what the nation's military response might be.

While the pundits droned on, one of my friends voiced what he thought would happen by uttering that hitherto unspeakable word — draft.

At the time, I thought the possibility of a national draft was unlikely. My reasoning was we hadn't had one since Vietnam, and public opinion is strongly opposed to the idea. Even the army, which initially fought doing away with the draft in 1973, is against it today. Besides, we fought the Persian Gulf War without the need for one. Why would this war be any different?

Thankfully for mothers everywhere, it doesn't look like we'll have a draft like the one used in Vietnam. This type of war calls for highly trained and specialized military forces, not an overwhelming number of troops.

Despite the necessity for one, I've been pondering the idea of a draft since then. President Bush and his administration have said all along this is a new kind of war. Perhaps what we need today is a new kind of draft.

The type of draft I'm supporting would have two goals. The first would be to meet the challenges of the current war. The second would be to instill in the nation's youth a permanent sense of national and civic pride.

This begs the question — what kind of draft do we implement that will accomplish these objectives?

A draft that gives people a choice to serve either in the military, as a member of homeland defense or as a part of a civil service organization, could accomplish the stated objectives.

The first choice is joining the military. This has been the purpose of every draft before and would have the desired effect of making sure we always had a sufficient army. Becoming a member of homeland defense is the second option. This could entail anything from serving on a rapid response terrorism team to a stint as a fireman or policeman. The last option, operating in a service organization, would expose people to the good works of community service.

Having choices does two important things. The first, is it allows those who are unwilling to serve in the military a way to do some other good. Second, it pushes people to get involved in government and civic careers they might not have even considered before. This involvement can create a lasting appreciation for community service and civil servants.

Why make people do community service or serve in the government? As David Gergen noted in his speech to the campus earlier this month, we treat our government today with an unhealthy amount of cynicism. While we hold up private industry as a glowing example of what's best in our society, we treat our government (and those who serve in it) as second-rate. By making people serve for a period of time in these roles, maybe we can squelch some of that cynicism and learn to appreciate our government.

Vietnam taught us a lot about what to do wrong in a draft. Mainly, it taught us not to have a draft of such inequality. Both wealthy Americans and those affluent enough to attend college could avoid service. Those who were less fortunate had to serve.

So how do we end this type of inequality? Simply make the draft mandatory. Have every American between the ages of 18 and 25 — black and white, male and female, rich and poor — serve for 12 to 24 months.

I realize this sort of thing would be hard to come to terms with initially, and it would be even harder to bring about politically. However, I think the benefits of what this type of draft has to offer potentially outweigh any burdens it might cause. As college students, we should support this type of idea should it arise in the near future in order to work toward creating a better America.

Energetic fans play role in success of basketball team

Editor,

In recent years, K-State football has been in the spotlight. However, not so very long ago, it was K-State basketball that drew the support of students, faculty and alumni.

When my grandfather attended K-State, fans packed Nichols Hall so full that people were forced to find seating in the rafters. In the early '70s, my parents attended K-State and cheered on the Cats in Ahearn Field House. My mom recounted a game against Kansas when the enthusiasm and rush into Ahearn was so great that my mom's feet never touched the ground as the students pushed their way through the doors.

It was at a K-State basketball game that the Wabash Cannonball was first played for the fans following the Nichols fire in 1968. In the heyday of K-State basketball, the fans never sat down during the games — not even during halftime. Everyone in Ahearn would cheer the Cats onto the court with the chant, "Bring On the Cats!"

Although the basketball program isn't what it was 20 years ago, I believe we have the coaching staff and athletes to regain a position at the top of the Big 12. This year's lineup, including the talents of our seniors (Larry) Reid, (Phineas) Atchison and (Travis) Reynolds and that of newcomers (Nick) Williams, (Gilson) DeJesus and (Pervis) Pasco, has what it takes to win games and provide fans with some amazing plays. The Wildcats are 2-1 in their season with 11 games to go.

It is said that an energetic crowd is the sixth man on the court. Anyone attending a K-State football game knows the team feeds off of the crowd and its thunderous cheering. If this is true for football, we need to help our basketball team out with our applause and cheers. With an increase in support for the Cats, there would be increased funding for the athletic department, which not only would help the basketball team, but also the many other sports programs at K-State.

As a student at K-State, I'm asking fellow students to go out and support the Wildcats. Season tickets are reasonably priced at $71 for 16 basketball tickets, which comes out to $4.44 per ticket. I think the entertainment of a basketball game is definitely worth the cost of a ticket. Every student who goes to a game makes a difference.

With few options for fun in Manhattan during the winter season, attending a basketball game is just what most students could use to break the boredom. Going to a basketball game is less expensive than most trips to Aggieville or attending a movie. Aside from providing something to do in an evening, attending a men's basketball game is an excellent way to show your Wildcat spirit. So please go out and give the Wildcats a chance to show you first-rate basketball by purchasing your season tickets for men's basketball.

Rep. Glasscock teaches political science class about budget

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Throwing Kansas budget burdens into the laps of K-State students, Kent Glasscock, Speaker of the Kansas House of Representatives, taught a political science course Tuesday afternoon in Waters 333.

"My speakership couldn't have come at a worse time," he said. "It's easy to govern when times are good, but it's hard when they're not."

"When times aren't good, we truly make decisions that change the next generations. We are forced to value certain programs over others."

Describing the backdrop to a current budget shortfall, he asked the students to solve the problem. He explained that during the legislature's spring session, representatives discovered they were $200 million short for their projected 2003 budget.

That is about a 7.5 percent decrease of a $4.5 billion budget, he said.

"We have significantly less money than we thought we had," he said. "It's been many generations since Kansas has seen this kind of problem."

He reviewed, dollar for dollar, certain program increases that

Kansas Legislature had to fund, such as Social Rehabilitation Services and public education versus program increases it would like to fund, such as higher education, special education and transportation.

"Given all revenue projections, if we take fiscal year 2002's budget and replicate it for fiscal year 2003 with no other increases than the $300 million we have to increase, and don't give anyone else anything, we still have to cut $350 million out of the budget," he said.

With the figures scratched onto the blackboard, the candidate for Lieutenant Governor split the class into three groups and accomplished in 10 minutes what the Legislature takes hours to do.

"I'm going to stop talking, and you're going to start figuring," he said. "This is the Tom Sawyer's method of governance."

"You have to cut $350 million or raise taxes."

He warned the students to be careful in which programs they cut because each decrease would have undesirable ramifications.

"There are no good options," he said. "All of the good options are gone. We will just have to package up all the bad options."

After 10 minutes, each group had decided to implement sales tax hikes to maintain program increases. One group suggested repealing Kansas blue laws allowing liquor sales on Sundays to generate more revenue.

Another group recommended cutting higher education and allowing the universities to make up for the cutbacks by raising tuition.

Glasscock said he appreciated many of their solutions.

"As you can obviously see, these decisions are really hard ones to make," he said. "When you have less money, you can't fund it all."

Elaine Gruenbacher, senior in secondary education, said she enjoyed finally being able to grapple with a real-life situation.

"It was cool that it was hands-on," Gruenbacher said. "It's not like looking at something from 10 years ago. This is something they are dealing with right now. After this, I have a much higher respect for what they have to do."

Michael Smith, assistant professor of political science, said he invited Glasscock to the class so his students would have the chance to interact with an actual policy maker.

"It exceeded my expectations," Smith said. "It goes nicely with what we were covering in class since we were talking about budgets. I just lucked out since I didn't ask him to discuss budgets."

He said he thought the students, with only 10 minutes, responded well to Glasscock's exercise although many of their solutions would not be feasible.

"In terms of public policy, a tax increase is not out of the question — maybe a little increase," he said. "But politically, it wouldn't go anywhere."

The students got a lot out of Glasscock's visit, he said, and if he has anything to do with it, it won't be his last.

"I appreciated that he came in here and treated us like knowledgeable people," he said. "We were surprised and got a look at how tough the budget really was."

Ancient Chinese sculpture donated to K-State, will be on display in Union

BY SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

K-State will receive one of 17 replicas in the world of a rare art piece from China.

The piece, which is a sculpture of a Terra-Cotta warrior protecting former Emperor Qin Shi Huang, was donated to K-State by Norman Brandeberry, who is a large contributor to K-State.

There will be a ribbon-cutting for the sculpture at noon Jan. 30. It will be permanently located on the ground floor of the K-State Student Union by the middle stairwell.

"China considers it one of its most important treasures," Union Director Bernard Pitts said. "It makes this fairly valuable and an important piece that we will be able to display here."

China does not allow the sculptures to leave the country, but it allowed 17 replicas to be made. K-State will receive the 14th replica. Former President Clinton owns the 17th.

More than 8,000 of the original sculptures were uncovered by peasants in 1974. Each statue is 5 feet, two inches tall and weighs about 220 pounds. It is estimated that it took about 720,000 laborers more than 37 years to complete the site.

The site was built for Huang, who ruled from 221 to 210 BC, as a burial ground. The soldiers were to accompany him in the afterlife.

It was considered one of the top archaeological discoveries of the 20th century and has been billed as the eighth wonder of the world.

History professor David Graff, who visited the burial ground in 1993, will present a short speech at the ribbon-cutting. He said the visit was memorable.

"I was just overwhelmed," Graff said on seeing the burial ground. "It's really fantastic."

K-State's sculpture will include an educational exhibit that explains the significance of the statue and the Qin dynasty. Most of the statues uncovered were regular soldiers, but the one K-State will receive is a general.

Having such a rare and historical art piece at K-State is quite important, Graff said. Hopefully, he said, students will take advantage of the opportunity to learn about this time period.

"I think it's wonderful," he said. "I was really excited. This is really something."

"It will make them think about China a little bit — its past. They can see something they're not used to seeing here."

The statue's unveiling will be a part of the Festival of Nations, sponsored by the Union Program Council. Chinese cuisine will be served, and there will be entertainment.

"It's targeting students," Erica Smith, multicultural coordinator for UPC, said.

"I think it's a good thing for K-State because it's such a cultural artifact that needs to be shown."

TURNING OVER A WIN

Sloppy is defined as "messy; marked by carelessness."

And K-State fans got that English lesson Tuesday night in the Wildcats' 79-73 win over Tennessee State (2-1) at Bramlage Coliseum.

The two teams combined for 12 turnovers in the first eight minutes, and K-State (3-1) edged the Tigers, 19-18, for the contest.

"It was a strange game," head coach Jim Wooldridge said. "It was a frustrating game for me. It's really upsetting how we handled the ball and handled the situations. You expect better play."

But it looked to be that kind of night.

On the very first possession of the game, Gilson DeJesus' pass to Larry Reid was picked off by Tennessee State's Jeff Cooperwood, who took the ball the other way for an uncontested dunk.

Yet, the Cats — who outscored their opponent 42-18 in the paint — would overcome a six-point halftime deficit and mount two double-digit runs in the second half to get the important thing — a win.

forward Matt Siebrandt said.

"We didn't play very well, but a W's a W," he said. "Everyone always says that, and we'll take it."

The Tigers set the pace early, quickly pushing the ball up the court on offense and utilizing full-court pressure defense to force the Cats into their type of game.

"It's the tempo we had to play in, and you obviously saw a lot of problems," Wooldridge said. "I don't think they allow you to slow down. You call a set to slow it down, and the next thing you know, they're trapping you, and now you've got to play out of it."

"We keep telling our guys when you get in situations where the defense forces you into a quicker pace, you've got to make decisions and you've got to go attack. You can't play keep-a-way. You've got to go to the basket."

But K-State chose the keep-a-way approach most of the first half, and the Tigers built their biggest lead of the game at 10 with 1:30 to play, before two late Cat buckets would close the gap to 42-36 at the break.

"They were really scrappy with that trap," Siebrandt said, "and if you're not strong with the ball and making good passes and good plays out there, you're going to get turnovers, and that's what happened in the first half."

After the intermission, though — as has been the precedent this season — K-State would stage a comeback.

Down 47-37 at the 17-minute mark, a Travis Reynolds score inside sparked a 14-0 run for the Cats — holding the Tigers scoreless for nearly six minutes — to give the purple a four-point advantage.

K-State wasn't finished there.

Coming out of a Wooldridge timeout with 7:28 to play, the Cats expended another near-six minute run — this time, 13-0 — to gain the lead for good. Janerio Spurlock hit a three-pointer with 3:37 to go, pushing K-State up five, 67-62 — a shot Wooldridge said might have been the difference in the game.

Reid had a clear layup on the play, but kicked it out to the wide-open Spurlock, who drained the trey from deep in the corner.

"I just told him, 'I'm going to penetrate the ball, and follow me down to the corner,'" Reid said. "He did what I said. I hit him, and he hit the shot."

Reid followed that bucket with back-to-back scores, and the purple held off

Tennessee State down the stretch.

The Cats' point guard led the team in scoring for the third time this season with 18 points, while Spurlock chipped in 11 and Reynolds notched his first double-double of the year, posting 14 points and 10 boards.

Wooldridge's club also limited Kyle Rolston, the Tigers' leading scorer (23 pp to 1-of-11 shooting and just three points).

Reynolds said K-State expected a tough challenge from Tennessee State, especially since the Cats needed a Phineas (Tony) Atchison three-pointer last year just to send the game into overtime.

"This team came in here last year and did the same thing," Reynolds said. "It took Tony to hit a couple of shots for us at the buzzer last year to get the win, but it was a scrappy game. They didn't have nothing to lose, and they played like that."

Nonetheless, Wooldridge said his team knew the Tigers would be a quick, aggressive team, and the problems were just too frequent Tuesday night.

"It's not just handling the ball. It's decisions. It's poise," he said, "and we don't have a lot of that going on right now."

Close games becoming commonplace early in season with win over Tigers

BY SEAN PURCELL

Kansas State Collegian

K-State couldn't have been too worried trailing 42-36 at halftime Tuesday night — they had been in the same situation each game this season.

But, like two other times this year, the Cats stormed back and proved victorious in yet another close ball game.

"We were disappointed by the way we played going into half," freshman Nick Williams said.

"We felt like we couldn't keep playing that way."

Despite the shooting woes K-State experienced in the first half, the Cats sizzled coming out of the locker room, shooting 54.2 percent from the field.

Even though the turnaround produced a victory for the Cats, players and coaches still have concerns about the early season erratic play.

"We always seem to dig a hole for ourselves in the first half by being loose with the ball and not making the right decisions," senior Larry Reid said. "Down the stretch we dug a little deeper and found a way to win, but we have to find a way to put teams away in the first half so that we don't have to do that in the late minutes of a ball game."

K-State finally emerged from the six-point halftime deficit, and a 14-0 run early in the second half put the Cats up 51-47. The Cats would need a 13-0 surge late in the game to bury the Tigers for good.

Junior Matt Siebrandt said the team needs to focus on playing more consistently through both halves.

"We like 13-0 and 14-0 runs, but we don't want to have to go on those kinds of runs when we're down six," Siebrandt said.

"It's a trend we need to break because we aren't going to be able to do this against some teams."

For Williams, those teams are Big 12 opponents.

He said it will be important to correct the team's mistakes in the first half because if those same errors are made in January and February, the outcome will be different.

"If we are down like that in the first half of a conference game, there will be no coming back against teams like Kansas, Oklahoma and Texas," Williams said.

"So, we will have to figure out what is wrong and turn it around quick."

A consistent positive for the Cats has been the defense's ability to keep the team in each game. K-State has kept each of its four opponents to fewer than 37 percent shooting in the second half this season.

"Coach told us during halftime that we have to go out and play with confidence, and not play timid," Janerio Spurlock said. "We came out and played with a little more heart, and that was the difference."

One factor of K-State's struggles, head coach Jim Wooldridge said, has stemmed from the lack of production in K-State's offense in the first half.

However, he said he feels strongly that there's a definitive positive the team can pull from this.

"These are hard things to figure out, but the one constant thing that appears to be happening with our team that you can point to is that these kids are building a personality about their team that has some character to it — some caring — because this is frustrating to them, too," Wooldridge said.

"I'm over there on them, and the crowd is disappointed in them, I think — but they are rallying themselves and keeping their heads up, and that is a real positive because when some teams get down, they don't compete as hard. So there is something in there."

class in sub-arctic temperatures. Don't get too upset, though. There's less than three weeks until the semester is over.

So in the spirit of the semester ending and grades being released, I am giving my grades for the football team, broken down by position. Offense is this week, defense goes next week.

Quarterbacks: C

This wasn't a great year to be a Wildcat signal caller. Success of previous quarterbacks proved hard to follow. Eli Roberson did show flashes of brilliance against Oklahoma and Nebraska, but struggled through the rest of the Big 12 games.

An ankle injury was part of the problem. Roberson's a great runner, but his throwing numbers — 39.8 percent — with eight picks and only four touchdowns are dreadful. You had to figure it would be hard for Eli to live up to the insane amount of hype he faced coming into the season.

Marc Dunn also struggled in his first year of Division I football. Billed as the better passer of the two, Dunn completed 47.9 percent of his passes, but matched Roberson's eight interceptions and four touchdowns.

Offensive coordinator Ron Hudson deserves some of the blame. Neither of the quarterbacks improved much over the season, which is reason to worry. Plus, the play calling could have been better. Roberson's ability to run makes him the starter next year.

Running backs: A+

K-State has one of the best backfields in the country. Josh Scobey, as expected, emerged as the star and had a career year. Just think how good his numbers would be if Hudson would have given him the ball more than 15 times against the Cats' three best opponents — Oklahoma, Colorado and Nebraska.

Rock Cartwright had a great year at fullback. I wish he would have gotten more touches. He was great last year on third down. He and Scobey will be in an NFL camp this summer. The emergence of Darren Sproles and reemergence of Joe Hall were exciting to see and gave the Cats a good change of pace in the backfield. But Sproles is the future.

Wide Receiver: C

Maybe we've been spoiled the last few years. Aaron Lockett struggled this year because he didn't have a big-time guy playing alongside him to take some of the pressure.

If you think a C is too harsh of a grade, consider this: Quincy Morgan caught 64 passes himself last year. Lockett (24), Brandon Clark (19) and Ricky Lloyd (20) combined for 63 this year. Inexperienced quarterbacks had something to do with it, but production was down big time.

Next year could be worse unless someone emerges. Lockett, Clark and Lloyd all played their final game at KSU Stadium against Missouri.

Tight Ends: B+

Nick Warren was better than advertised, despite the fact K-State always underuses its tight ends. Warren had a nice year, posting more catches and yards than Shad Meier did last season.

Offensive line: B+

Despite being plundered by injuries, the offensive line opened big holes for the running game the entire season. Pass protection could have been better. Andy Eby and Nick Leckey were the top performers on the line.

Kickers: F

It was really ugly watching the Wildcats kick this year. Before Joe Rheem hit three field goals against Missouri on Saturday, K-State had only four the entire year. Four! Forget field goals. Jared Britte, Kyle Altvater, Wade Waltman, Travis Brown and Rheem all missed at least one extra point. Are these guys on scholarship? Hopefully, Rheem is the answer.

Overall, a very inconsistent season for the Wildcat offense. That's what happens when there's inexperience at quarterback. They lose a lot again this off-season. Coaches will be counting on either Roberson or Dunn to be the leader next year.

Sibling singers to perform at Union

BY JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

When it comes to music, for the Hammonds, it's all in the family.

The Hammond family will perform from noon to 1 p.m. today in the K-State Student Union Courtyard. The group is comprised of four sisters and their brother.

Jessica Hammond, soprano, said they have been singing together since they were very young, learning the ropes of gospel music in church together. With a family that has a background in music, Hammond said the siblings all have developed musical talents.

"We have great ears, and our ability to hear different parts in a piece is excellent," she said. "Also, our voices blend very well together."

Hammond said her father, mother and grandmothers on both sides have all been gospel singers. Her paternal grandmother even recorded an album at one point. Now this generation carries on the tradition.

Practice comes easy since they are so close, alto Janet Hammond, freshman in political science, said. Janet said she has been singing with her seven other brothers and sisters since she could talk. Music is her means of expression, she said.

"I like to share my feelings, and I think I express myself musically better than I do talking because I talk a lot, but the feeling doesn't come across like it does when I'm singing," Janet said.

The group will be accompanied by keyboardist Tim Robinson and their brother, Michael Hammond, on drums. Jessica said they will be singing some Christmas music as well as gospel music and a song written by their uncle. With every song they perform, it might be written by someone else, but the siblings make it their own, Jessica said.

The family attends the Faith

The Hammonds

The Hammond family will perform for free from noon to 1 p.m. today in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

Covenant Center in Junction City where they are involved with the church musically, Jessica said. The religious message is part of the gospel music Jessica said she hopes people pick up.

"Singing is a form of worship for us," she said. "It's our praise to God. The Bible says God inhabits the praises of his people, so when we sing to him, it's like he's coming down to spend some time with us."

Old gospel music is where Eugene Hammond, the only male singer in the group, said he finds inspiration. The older gospel music is more appealing because the message is stronger than in contemporary gospel, Eugene said.

"It's based on a relationship with God, and it talks about the comfort and the peace found in the ways of God," he said.

During the last 10 years, Jessica said, the family has been performing together outside of their church, doing invitation-based performances in nearby towns. Jessica said her family is easy to perform with.

"I don't want to brag but we all fit together very well," she said. "We all have a wide range vocally so we can switch parts around and make things fit. We probably don't rehearse as much as we should but it's just all so natural with us anyway."

Though he performs with school choirs, Eugene said he always prefers his brothers and sisters.

"There's nobody else like my family because some people are good, but they're just not my family," he said. "I know I'm biased, but everyone else is pale in comparison to singing with my family."

Theater troupe presents comic nuns in musical

BY JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

The spirit of Christmas, a country-singing nun and a cross-dressing priest are all part of the fun in "Nuncrackers."

The musical is the fourth play in the "Nonsense" series and is now showing at the Junction City Little Theatre. Director Jill Volland said the comic nuns have proved to be a big draw.

"We did another one of the 'Nonsense' plays here before, and people came back two or three times to see it," she said. "It was a huge hit in the community. It's a very family-oriented show, and it's a fun Christmas show."

In "Nuncrackers," a group of nuns and the parish priest are planning

Christmas when the presents they have bought for each other mysteriously disappear. Several sketches and musical numbers within the musical help to convey the Christmas message.

Deb Barnes, instructor at Fort Riley Middle School, plays Sister Amnesia. She said "Nuncrackers" is appropriate because of the comic material.

"We need something light-hearted this season with all that's happening," she said. "This is just something to let people smile and get ready for the season."

Charles Volland plays Father Virgil. He said it was fun working with his daughter, Jill, as director. Volland said he was the unofficial music director and he enjoyed the variety of styles of music that are used.

Holiday Nonsense

"Nuncrackers" will show at 8 p.m. Friday and Saturday at the Junction City Little Theatre. Tickets are $10 for adults and $5 for students and are available at the Little Theatre, (785) 238-6220.

Finally, getting an audience to see the play helps the actors, Volland said.

"Trying to keep the comedy element in weeks of rehearsal where no one is reacting is challenging sometimes," he said. "The audience motivates you in performances."

Jill said the play was brought to her by Barnes, and she knew she wanted to do the script because it allowed for more than just adult performers.

"In the summer, we do a theater workshop with kids in the community, but there aren't many shows that give them a chance to perform," she said. "There's a lot of talented kids in the arts, and we want to carry that on by giving them something positive to do."

Elizabeth Sites plays Sister Robert Ann. She said attending a Catholic school when she was younger gives her special insight into some of the jokes in the play.

The play is something different for her since she doesn't often do musicals, so Sites said she enjoys the change of pace.

For Barnes, acting gives her the chance to experience what it's like becoming someone else.

"Any time you're on stage you get to step outside yourself," she said. "Up there you can be whoever you want and do whatever you want."

Ashcroft: terrorist suspects being detained might link to bin Laden

BY KAREN GULLO
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Attorney General John Ashcroft announced Tuesday his department continues to detain more than 550 people on immigration violations or other federal charges in the terrorism investigation, and some are believed to be members of Osama bin Laden's network.

Ashcroft said those detained were rounded up in a "deliberate campaign of arrests" designed to disrupt terrorist activities and protect Americans.

"With arrests and detentions, we have avoided further terrorist attacks... America's defenses have grown stronger," he said.

Ashcroft said that a number of individuals being detained are suspected terrorists, adding, "I don't want to be more specific."

The attorney general's announcement was the first accounting of people in federal custody in several weeks. Previously, the government had said only that it detained or arrested more than 1,100 people without identifying them or saying which remained in custody.

Ashcroft said the terrorism investigation had charged 104 people with federal crimes, and that 55 of those remained in custody. In addition, he said, 548 people remain in custody on immigration charges, some of whom are also charged with federal crimes.

The announcement comes amid concerns in Congress and among civil rights groups about the secrecy surrounding those who have been detained, most of whom are believed to be of Middle Eastern descent.

Ashcroft defended the secrecy, including the fact that most of the names of the detainees have not been public, saying he wanted to protect the privacy of people who might be innocent and prevent bin Laden from gaining valuable information.

"I am not interested in providing, when we are at war, a list to Osama bin Laden and the al-Qaeda network of the people we have detained that would make any easier their effort to kill Americans," Ashcroft said.

On Monday, Ashcroft said he also was protecting the privacy of detainees.

"I'm not going to develop some sort of blacklist," he said.

His remarks Monday prompted complaints from civil rights groups who have urged the Justice Department to disclose more information about those detained or arrested in the terrorism investigation.

"It is ironic that the government is now concerned about rights when it has arrested and jailed hundreds of people without giving the American public any proof that the detainees are being treated fairly and consistent with the protections of the Constitution and Bill of Rights," said Lucas Guttentag, head of the American Civil Liberties Union's immigration rights project.

Ashcroft's refusal came as the terrorism investigation advanced overseas and a federal agent in Virginia described a possible motive for one of the 19 hijackers on Sept. 11. FBI Special Agent Jesus Gomez said suspected terrorist ringleader Mohammed Atta blamed the United States for most of the world's wars.

"Atta felt that the U.S. was responsible for most of the wars being fought in the world," Gomez said during an abbreviated preliminary hearing in Alexandria, Va., federal court for Agus Budiman, an Indonesian man who prosecutors believe was a close associate of Atta.

Budiman, 31, had contacts with Atta and another hijacker, Marwan al-Shehhi, Gomez told a judge at Budiman's detention hearing. The agent did not specify how he learned of Atta's beliefs about America.

Budiman also was associated with Ramsi Binalshibh, who the FBI says was meant to be the 20th hijacker. Binalshibh twice tried unsuccessfully to use his association with Budiman as a means to enter the United States, Gomez said.

Binalshibh, a Yemeni citizen who had been living in Hamburg, is the subject of an international manhunt.

Budiman is facing document fraud charges unrelated to Sept. 11, but prosecutors suspect that the man Budiman allegedly helped to obtain a fake Virginia ID card, Mohammad Bin Nasser Belfas, is a contact for bin Laden, suspected of directing the terror attacks.

Budiman's court-appointed attorney disqualified himself after Gomez testified about the man's links to the terrorists. The lawyer, a retired Army officer, said he had friends who died Sept. 11 when hijackers crashed an American Airlines jet into the Pentagon.

Ivan Yacub, Budiman's immigration lawyer, said his client only knew Atta casually and had not seen Atta since he came to the United States in October 2000.

Most of the more than 1,100 people arrested or detained by federal or state authorities are being held on immigration violations. Others are charged with unrelated criminal offenses or are being held as material witnesses.

Civil liberties groups and members of Congress have asked the Justice Department to disclose information about the detainees, where they are being held and whether they have been released. The department has demurred, citing grand jury rules, judges' orders and privacy concerns.

Cloned eggs act as medicine

BY RANDOLPH E. SCHMID
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A scientist whose company announced the first cloning of a human embryo says that if he had 200 to 300 human eggs to work with, he would have a 90-percent chance of creating a colony of stem cells that might fight human disease.

"Human eggs are very precious and hard to come by," said Dr. Jose Cibelli, vice president of research at Advanced Cell Technology.

The Worcester, Mass., company announced Sunday that it had succeeded in cloning a human embryo for the first time, growing it to six cells before it quit developing.

The company's ultimate goal is to cull stem cells from a cloned embryo, master cells that could then be grown into custom medical treatments for patients — but this first embryo was too small to generate stem cells.

"These are baby steps, but they are steps in the right direction," Cibelli said Tuesday.

However, the disclosure prompted denunciations from right-to-life groups and a call by President Bush for a ban on cloning.

Cibelli said he didn't expect the strong response and speculated that the president was caught unaware.

"I hope eventually he'll be able to understand," Cibelli said in an interview.

He said the process of developing a human clone was much harder than with animals because of the scarcity of human eggs.

"It took us a year to get 17," he said. "With cows, we get 400 a day."

In developing the human clone, the researchers started with a donated female egg cell. They removed its nucleus and replaced it with a cumulus cell, complete with its genetic DNA. Cumulus cells normally help nurture eggs as they develop.

Such a technique could only yield replacement cells for women of childbearing age. But the researchers have also experimented with injecting cells with DNA from skin cells.

"What is happening in these eggs is magical," Cibelli said.

If his researchers could get 200 to 300 human eggs to experiment with, there would be a 90-percent chance of developing a stem cell line, Cibelli said.

Creating stem cells is a prime goal of cloning researchers because they form early in the development of an embryo and can then become virtually any part of the body.

Properly developed, cloned stem cells could offer hope to many people suffering diseases that require transplants of various tissues.

But opponents of cloning fear the process also will be used to create copies of human beings, a procedure with serious religious and ethical considerations.

"I am confused as to why we seem to have such a hard time making the distinction between reproductive and therapeutic uses," Cibelli said.

He said his personal opinion is that reproductive cloning is bad because it's too dangerous for both the mother and the child, but millions of people can benefit from therapeutic cloning.

Asked how he responds to people who liken therapeutic cloning — where the embryo must be destroyed to harvest the stem cells — to abortion, Cibelli said, that's an extremely personal view.

In therapeutic cloning, the researcher borrows the machinery of the egg for five to seven days and can save lives, he said, adding, "I don't think that's the creation of a human being. It's a new way of making medicine."

Cibelli said ethical questions were a main consideration during his company's research on a human clone, and the company's ethics committee set strict requirements for the safety and informed consent of the people donating cells.

Human cloning could be banned in the United States if the Senate agrees to a bill already passed by the House. It's banned now in some states.

Asked if his company would move its research overseas in the event of a ban, Cibelli responded that "we need to make a strong enough case to do the work in the United States."

He said scientists would be willing to consult with Congress and the White House on the issue.

Congress monitoring missile proposals between U.S., Egypt

BY BARRY SCHWEID
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Congress is looking into reports that North Korea is providing Egypt with long-range missiles even as the Bush administration plans to sell the Arab country more than 50 surface-to-surface missiles in a $400 million arms deal, a congressional source said Tuesday.

Administration officials have been asked to testify behind closed doors Friday on the reports of a North Korean missile deal. The United States plans to arm Egypt with 53

Harpoon Block II satellite-guided anti-ship missiles were reported by The Washington Post and confirmed on Capitol Hill.

Two senior members of Congress — Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and Rep. Tom Lantos, D-Calif., senior Democrat on the House International Relations Committee — have questioned the U.S. deal as a potential threat to Israeli ships. Presumably, the missiles could reach land targets as well.

The deal was outlined in a classified memorandum to Congress in early November, said the congress-sional aide, speaking on condition of anonymity.

It surfaced as Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Maher was arriving in Washington for talks with Secretary of State Colin Powell and members of Congress on Thursday.

Meanwhile, a senior State Department official plans to go to Saudi Arabia this week to confer with officials of the Arab kingdom about efforts to counter terrorism.

William Burns, the assistant secretary of state, also will report on new U.S. efforts to establish a cease-fire and start Israel and the Palestinians on a path of peacemaking.

Burns is in the region with Anthony Zinni, a retired Marine Corps. general, to try to mediate a cease-fire and rekindle peace talks.

Zinni is staying on, but Burns will make stops in a handful of Arab countries and return to Washington.

The New York Times, in a report from Riyadh, said Saudi Arabia was balking at American requests to freeze the bank accounts of those the United States says are linked to terrorism.

The report said a U.S. delegation would be sent to Saudi Arabia to persuade its officials to cooperate.

But Richard Boucher, the State

Department spokesman, credited the Saudis with excellent cooperation in cutting off financial assets for terrorists. The Riyadh government has instructed banks to look for and freeze accounts linked to terrorists, Boucher said Tuesday.

An official at the Saudi embassy called the story in the Times absolute nonsense.

Earlier, two administration officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, told The Associated Press that the Saudis are cooperating. They said Burns would head the delegation and that terrorism is one of several items on his agenda.

One of the officials said Powell's assertion earlier in the month that the Saudis were cooperating in the U.S. campaign against terrorism was still on the mark.

White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said later, "The Saudi Arabian government has done everything the United States has asked it to do in the war on terrorism."

Bush spoke by phone Tuesday with Jordan's King Abdullah, Fleischer said. He said they discussed the war in Afghanistan and the Mideast peace process, but he had no further details.

TIMELESS TRADITIONS

Inexpensive, simple trends contribute to holiday decorations

BY ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

American flags are on Christmas trees, ribbons are the season's instant decoration and icicle lights are still in.

This year's holiday décor has many timeless traditions, but also brings simple trends that are not only easy, but cheap for students.

"The beauty of Christmas is that it's not terribly trendy," said Lynn Urlick, interior designer and owner of Lynn Urlick Interior Design. "Things don't change that much from year to year."

Still, Urlick said she has noticed more patriotic ornaments and decorations this year that have not been as available in the past. When trends arise, she said, it is easy to let it clutter your living space.

It is best, she said, to keep it simple.

"It's better to stick with a few significant things than a lot of clutter this and that," she said. "It has a better design impact."

A challenge for students is dealing with a smaller living space to achieve that design impact, she said.

They can combat this by not adding many more large items to their rooms, and instead strategically placing ribbons and bows on furniture and items already in the rooms, she said.

One way for anyone to work more effectively with a small space is to not have a full-sized holiday tree, she said.

Since her family usually is not at home on Christmas Day, she has not had a full evergreen in her house in 10 years.

"You should consider using a cutting or a live small cedar instead of a full tree," she said. "You could ask a farmer if you could cut down a nice cedar from their pasture, which are sometimes considered a nuisance.

They are fragrant and wonderful."

She said a small tree would not only fit the simple trends of today, but also would be a cheap alternative since less ornaments and only one string of lights are needed.

Linda Williams, owner of Country Gift Shop, said customers actually are buying more ornaments this year because they are purchasing more trees.

"Many people are having more than one tree," Williams said. "They're putting them in their living rooms, their kitchens and in other parts of their homes. It's an opportunity to have a variety of different looks."

If students don't have the money or don't want to spend the time in decorating multiple trees, she said ornaments are good pieces to highlight homes.

"You can just do so much with ornaments," she said. "You can put them in a bowl or hang them from a wreath instead of a tree."

She also said she's been buying more Americana items for her customers who are incorporating the patriotic look into their holiday decorating.

Metallic and blues have been more popular this year, Sharon Johnson, Kmart operations manager, said.

"Two years ago, everyone just had to have mauves and pinks," she said. "If we put those out on the floor now, everyone would cringe."

Customers seem to want items that look handmade this year as well, she said. They are buying a lot of snowmen, wreaths and painted sleighs.

"Everyone is going for that crafty-type-Martha Stewart stuff," she said.

"It just seems to be a trend. Everyone's going to all the craft shows, and they want to incorporate it into their Christmas decorating."

'TRL Christmas' has something for everyone, focuses on younger generation of listeners

BY JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

Driven by some of the biggest names in pop music, "TRL Christmas" either will make your head bob with the candy-cane tracks or it will make your ears bleed before you hit the stop button.

The disc has something for nearly everyone in its 15 upbeat Christmas tracks, but if you don't like top 40 music, you'll be skipping through all but a couple of songs. True to the title, the lineup on this album looks like Carson Daly himself picked it.

The three lead tracks are done by Willa Ford, "Nsync and Christina Aguilera with Aguilera impressively standing out as she belts out "Angels We Have Heard On High."

Blink-182's crass anti-Christmas "I Won't Be Home For Christmas" counteracts some of the sappy tunes with the words "It's Christmas time again / It's time to be nice to the people you can't stand / All year / I'm growing tired of all this Christmas cheer."

To please those above the age of 14, the album has a couple of tracks that might appeal to a broader spectrum of listeners.

Weezer's "The Christmas Song" and Jimmy Fallon's "Snowball" stand out on the otherwise predictable album. Fallon brings his Saturday Night Live humor to the disc as he sings "Snow day, school's closed and I can't wait / To go outside and I just might / Get into a snowball fight."

Little T and One Track Mike's "Snow Angel" surprisingly is one of the most interesting tracks on the album.

Poetic hip-hop rhymes backed up by a sentimental beat and melody provided by One Track Mike make the song something more than the humorous rap songs the duo are accustomed to.

The Trans-Siberian Orchestra's "Christmas Canon" reworks

"TRL CHRISTMAS"

CD REVIEW BY JJ DUNCAN

Pachabell's age-old classic to end off the album. It's an unlikely tasteful selection that rounds off the disc quite nicely.

All in all, most of this album is fluff that your 13-year-old sister or cousin probably will love. With names like Sugar Ray and LFO, you can't expect much more. A few of the tracks still are worth checking out, even if TRL music isn't your cup of tea.

It's a well-balanced Christmas album for mostly a younger generation that packs a few surprises inside.

SHOPPING CHARADE

Local businesses prepare for rush of season's patrons

BY EDIE HALL
Kansas State Collegian

Less than a month of shopping days are left before Christmas. Local merchants have been preparing their inventory and staff for the influx in business the month of December usually brings.

The months of November and December accounted for 27.1 percent of items sold at malls in 2000, according to the International Council of Shopping Centers.

Business for most retail stores increases considerably in the months before the Christmas holiday.

According to ICSC, 98 percent of malls will extend their holiday shopping hours to accommodate this extra business.

Manhattan Town Center is lengthening its business hours beginning Dec. 8 and running through Christmas. Instead of being open from 10 a.m. until 9 p.m. on weekdays, the mall will be open from 9:30 a.m. until 9:30 p.m.

Stores within the mall also might hire extra help and have extra training for staff to deal with the increase.

"I would say business probably increases about 50 percent," Waldenbooks store manager Melissa Theel said. "When the holidays are coming up, we advise our staff that business will be picking up and that they need to be on their toes."

Theel also said Waldenbooks

hires temporary holiday help.

"I start looking at applications the beginning of September and have the extra help hired by the first of October," Theel said. "We really consider people who will be staying in town over the holidays. We need them the day after Thanksgiving and the day after Christmas."

According to the survey ICSC sent out, most respondents thought video game hardware and software and entertainment products such as CD's, videos and DVD's would report the highest sales growth during the 2001 holiday season.

Musicland in Manhattan Town Center is getting ready for those expectations, Whitney Gebhart, employee, said.

"We do a lot more hiring during the holidays," Gebhart said. "Usually, we add upwards to six people for holiday temps. They go through training, and we also implement new programs, such as gift cards, during this time."

Although it is new to the mall, Aeropostale is anxious and excited for the holiday season, store manager Teresa Sharritt said.

"We are a first-year store here, and there are only two Aeropostales in Kansas—here and in Topeka. So, since we are new to the area, we are expecting a little more than the normal holiday business increase."

Sharritt said she is expecting four or five times as many customers as the store has on a regular day in the days before Christmas.

Outside of the mall, businesses might not expect quite the same type of increase.

"We can feel a definite increase before the holidays, but we aren't as dependent on it as other merchants may be," said

Clark Peters, assistant sales manager for The Pathfinder. "We don't really have to do anything all that different. We just make certain we have gift-type items in stock."

Merchants stock up on K-State apparel, gifts

BY TINA DEINES
Kansas State Collegian

Christmas is getting closer, and the season of shopping is right around the corner. While most people are wondering what they should buy for friends and family members, local merchants are stocking up on their K-State gifts and apparel.

According to area businesses, purple is big during the Christmas season.

"K-State sweatshirt blankets are big sellers, etched glasses and anything purple—jackets, coats and leather coats," Varney's cashier Linda Lillibridge said.

Carolyn Rose, K-State Union Bookstore clothing and gift buyer, said she agreed that K-State items sell well during the holiday season.

"For Christmas gifts, we sell a lot of keepsake items such as pen and pencil sets and ornaments. This year, we also have Henry and Alice the snowmen, which is also popular."

Andrea Higgins, assistant manager of The Palace, said K-State merchandise also sells well at The Palace.

She said one of the biggest sellers

in previous years has been the K-State Santas.

"I don't think we've sold as many this year, but there's still quite a few shopping days left. They've been quite a good seller in the past," she said.

Some of the other K-State Christmas items available include dancing Santas, a variety of ornaments and apparel.

With the fall semester ending in December, Higgins said this influences the sell of K-State items.

"We sell K-State merchandise very well because of winter graduation," she said.

Rose said she agreed and said the new K-State alumni ring is a popular choice among customers who are buying for recent graduates.

"The Union Bookstore is the K-State official sales point for the new alumni ring, so people are ordering those as gifts," Rose said.

Dan Burr, cashier for Ballard's Sporting Goods, said that while the store carries specialty Christmas items, regular K-State merchandise such as license plates and clothing sell well.

"Basically, we sell more apparel than knick-knack things," Burr said.

"When the holidays are coming up, we advise our staff that business will be picking up and that they need to be on their toes."

Spirit of season reason for holiday job

There is nothing that compares to the joys and frustrations of working retail during the holidays.

Since my first job, I've always worked retail during the holidays.

Many people think working retail during the holidays must be a living hell. You probably think I'm insane for continuing to work retail after almost five holiday seasons.

There are two things that keep me in there — the people and the spirit of the season.

Last Christmas I worked at a store that was always incredibly busy. Even with all of our cash registers running, we still had lines of customers stretching out the door.

There's nothing more frustrating than waiting in line for half an hour to pay for one tiny Christmas gift when you have 8 million other things you could be doing.

This is the perfect climate for someone to lose his or her temper. Tensions start to mount. People begin to sweat and emit foul odors underneath their layers of winter insulation. Little kids start to cry.

At this point, the customer must make a decision. Some put down their intended purchases and walk out of the store, mumbling under their breath about how insane the holiday rush is. Others sigh and shift their weight to the other foot and continue to wait patiently. Then, you have the complainers.

They feel as if it is their duty to let every employee they see know how horrible the service is. They say the situation is unacceptable and something must be done to meet their needs. Now.

These are the people who make working retail a living hell. They blame you for computer malfunctions. They think it's your fault an item was more popular than expected and the warehouse didn't send you enough supply to meet their demand. They want to make your life miserable just because they couldn't buy a $9 bottle of body lotion in their favorite scent that was discontinued five years ago.

If I had to deal with people like this all day, I would be pulling my hair out before the end of my shift was over. Thankfully, most people aren't that way.

Working in a retail store over the holidays has always been interesting.

I usually can spot the brothers/sons/boyfriends/husbands who have no idea what the person they're buying for wants. These are the people who make working retail fun.

It's pretty much the same every time. A male walks into the store with the look of a deer caught in headlights on his face. He hesitates and moves to the side to avoid the women and children milling about and picking up bottles of scented lotions and shower gels. Their posture and expression belie how intimidated the men are.

Usually, they don't know what they're looking for. They just want something that their sister/mom/girlfriend/wife would be happy with. Although it sometimes takes a while to find the perfect gift, their actions at the end of the transaction always remind me of what the holiday season really is about.

Their faces light up with delight, relief and expectation. No longer do they have to wander around crowded malls searching for a gift they hope will please their recipient. Now all they have to do is wait for Christmas day so they can enjoy the praise for giving a gift that was exactly what someone wanted.

The holiday season is about charity and giving, even in the retail sector. I love being able to help people find the perfect gift that will make someone else happy. It makes me feel like I'm doing my part to spread the joy and warmth of the holiday season.

The icing on the cake is when your customers say two simple words: "Thank you." It makes enduring all of the rude, smelly customers, crying children and Christmas muzak bearable.

Finding the true meaning

Satisfaction of gift-giving should not be lost

It feels great when you find the perfect gift.

You can imagine in your mind's eye the look on the recipients' faces as they shed the wrapping paper and the one thing that they wanted this holiday season appears in their hands.

That's happened all of twice in my life. Usually I find something within my budget, and maybe they'll have a use for it. Time, money and effort limit the ability for one human being to shop successfully for 40 friends and family.

As frustrating as the holiday gift-giving season is, the warmth you feel when you brighten someone's day is in itself the best gift in the world.

The aged wisdom that "It's the thought that counts" is true, as is "It's better to give than to receive." But it's easy to lose perspective.

When you've spent 12 hours rumbling, stumbling, and tumbling through the sea of fellow shoppers, it's easy to become disenfranchised.

The holidays have become so commercialized that the true meaning of giving is lost in the holiday shuffle.

The thought no longer counts. Now it's the price tag. It's having the trendiest toys and the coolest clothes.

People were wrestling over Tickle Me Elmo dolls when they were the fad. That's ridiculous. I bet half the Elmo dolls don't even work now. Game systems like the Nintendo or Sega Genesis are outdated by the time any decent games come out. Clothes are out of style by the time you buy them.

If it were the thought that counted, no one would ever buy a Furbee. We would buy gifts based on what a person could really use or really wants. That's not easy, though.

It can be hard to find the right gift for that special someone. It can be downright impossible to shop for that uncle you only see on the holidays, yet there is that moral obligation to get him something. There are a few ways to increase your odds of figuring out the ideal gift for your girlfriend, boss or grandmother.

First, listen to what they talk about. Not only will you get more out of the relationship, but they also might drop subtle or subconscious hints about a sweater they found at the mall that they are crazy about.

They might also complain about something they have that's broken. Maybe your mom has been using the same baking pan since the Eisenhower administration and is a little worse for wear. The fact that you figured out something they could really use would mean the world to them.

Another way to get gift ideas is to look at their hobbies. What sorts of things do they enjoy doing? If you can piggyback your gift onto something they already enjoy, like mountain biking and a new water bottle or arm band Walkman, the lucky recipient will love it.

Talk to their friends. They might have been shopping with them and noticed the look on their face when they saw the perfect leather coat. Worst-case scenario, you can just ask them. You can expect the response, "Oh, I don't know." But on the random chance that they happen to think of something, it might be worth your while.

The secret to gift-giving is to care about the person you are shopping for. Apathy usually leads to shoddy presents. Caring about the people and wanting to get them something they'll enjoy will show through in the end.

If someone happens to get you the perfect gift, don't feel bad, because you didn't get him or her a gift of equal caliber. Gifts shouldn't be a form of showing up someone else, but rather of making others happy.

It truly is better to give than to receive, but that's easier said than done. We all love getting presents, especially college students.

The feeling of getting free stuff is great, but it pales in comparison to that aforementioned look on a person's face when he or she gets a gift from you.

It feels so good to get a gift because you know the people were thinking about you when they saw it and bought it or made it just for you. Thus, giving the gift is a great way to let the people know that you were thinking about them.

Keep in mind the reason for the holiday season. It's not to spend as much money as you can on your friends and family. It is about showing the ones you care about how much you care.

Even if it's just a hand-written card mailed to an old friend in California or Florida, the effort makes all the difference in the world.

drastic, Peters said the store doesn't usually hire new help, but instead gives the normal staff extra hours.

"Most of our staff is college students, and I'm sure they enjoy the extra money," Peters said.

According to the survey conducted by ICSC, many respondents said extra money available for spending as a result of lower interest rates, tax relief and mortgage refinancing would be factors supporting consumer spending this year.

While some respondents were skeptical about this year's holiday season because of declining consumer confidence and uncertainty surrounding the possibility of war, others anticipated that patriotism might fuel additional spending this holiday season.

ABOVE: This piece, featuring tiny flowers and a hummingbird, is one of many glass creations Brian Brown has made. Brown said depending on the piece, the items can take from minutes to days to complete. RIGHT: Brian Brown, of Branson, Mo., uses fire to heat glass and shape it in to various works of art Wednesday at Manhattan Town Center. Brown and his booth of glassworks are one of many seasonal vendors set up in the mall for the duration of the holiday shopping period.

Brian Brown's hummingbirds, flowers and boats have traveled around the world.

And now, he and his creations are settled in a booth in the center of Manhattan Town Center.

Brown, from Branson, Mo., is the owner of Crystal Revelations. His craft is lampwork glass blowing and he sells his creations at a gallery in Branson as well as in the country. Brown does all of the work, except the painting, which his wife sometimes helps him with.

"I can do almost anything," Brown said. "The ones here are my most popular, obviously, but I do some special requests, also. I specialize in birds and flowers."

Brown isn't the only merchant who has found himself nestled in the nook of the mall for the holiday season.

Allen Raynor, general manager of Manhattan Town Center, said there are at least eight stores, carts and booths that have rented spaces in the mall for the holiday season.

"They don't want to be here all year and pay high rent because, frankly," Raynor said, "their business is best for gifts during this time of year."

The holiday season is the best time for many business owners to travel the world to find business.

"It's like fishing — you go where the fish are," Brown said. "These people are looking for more business over the holiday season, and they come here to find it."

Brown said he loves what he does, but he has to be able to make money while doing it, which he said is why he is in Manhattan.

"I fell in love with the town, and I enjoyed the mall. It's nice to be able to work here this season," he said.

Brown credits his quality work to practicing every day. He said many people think that since they have developed a business, they think they don't need to practice their skills.

"I made my first piece 10 years ago, and I was hooked," Brown said. "But I still practice every day. As people are walking through watching me work and browse through the table, I'm probably practicing my craft. That's what I do."

Another thing Brown said he does is provide unique and personalized gifts to people who are willing to stop and take a look.

"This is something people don't usually buy for themselves, but wished they did," he said.

Only Nuts is another business that has located in Manhattan just for the season.

Photos by Zach Long/Collegian

Only Nuts makes all of their own nuts with a German machine. The nuts are coated in cinnamon and other sweets and specially gift-packaged for customers.

Business owner Earlene Chilcott, from Marion, Kan., said she has traveled through many states this time of year to get their product in the hands and stomachs of holiday shoppers.

"People want food and sweets this time of year," she said. "I can't blame them at all."

However, traveling has caused Chilcott and her family to spend Christmas in different places each year.

"We've been everywhere and met lots of people," she said. "We get a new environment every Christmas, but we don't mind, especially this year, since we're closer to home."

Bush backs legislation that stays within U.S. farming budget limits

BY PHILIP BRASHER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — While a Democratic-backed overhaul of farm subsidies waits in the Senate, President Bush said Wednesday he wants generous but affordable farm legislation that adheres to budget limits and gives farmers a safety net without leading to an overproduction of crops.

His secretary of agriculture said the Democrats' bill raises subsidy rates up to 20 percent and could encourage such overproduction and drive down commodity prices.

"This creates pressure for more government payments, thereby creating a self-defeating and ultimately unsustainable cycle," said Agriculture Secretary Ann Veneman.

The remarks by Bush and Veneman to a farm convention meeting were the administration's first substantive comments on the Senate farm bill. Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle planned to bring it to a vote by next week. The legislation faces a Republican filibuster.

White House press secretary Ari Fleischer later suggested that farmers should fall in line behind the economic stimulus package on which Bush is demanding action by the Senate.

"On the farm bill ... the president thinks the timing is odd in the Senate. At a time when all Americans need help, why is the Senate abandoning all Americans and focusing only on one segment of America, even if it's a segment as important as farmer?" Fleischer said.

The administration favors a GOP farm bill that has lower subsidy rates and would provide assistance to a broader range of farmers. The Republican plan would set up subsidized IRA-style savings accounts that would let farmers sock away income in good years to use when crops or prices are poor.

"A good farm bill should keep a safety net under our food producers without misleading our farmers into overproducing crops that are already in oversupply," Bush said.

"A good farm bill should be generous but affordable. It should honor the budget limits that Congress has agreed to live by."

Existing farm programs do not expire until next fall, but Daschle said growers need the assistance that would be provided by the Senate bill. He also raised concerns about whether the U.S. Department of Agriculture would have time to write rules for new programs if Congress does not soon finish the legislation.

"I don't think you can emphasize enough the urgency with which we need to address farm legislation," said Daschle, D-S.D.

Democrats forced their bill through the Senate Agriculture Committee earlier this month after giving Southern senators more money for big farms and adding a dairy program that could raise retail milk prices.

Republicans criticized what they called a partisan bill. Kansas Sen. Pat Roberts said the measure "was pushed through with little debate or consideration, and it will take us 'back to the future' and the failed policies of the past."

Roberts, an architect of the 1996 market-oriented reforms, said the Democratic bill would lead to higher loan

Instead of fighting the holiday shopping crowds this year, many people are turning to online shopping sites to purchase their gifts.

Jennifer Kobusewski, co-director of Victoria's Secret, fields many questions from her store customers about the store's online version.

"There is different merchandise online since they are a separate division," she said. "The online store is probably more convenient since they don't have to leave their house and can get it shipped right to their house."

The store's online site, www.victoriasecret.com, features regular merchandise for purchase along with special sections, including top 10 gifts, holiday dressings and gifts in red. Shoppers also can search for clearance sale items.

Other services, such as the career finder and store locator, aid customers in finding out more about the company.

Kobusewski said that although the online store is nice, there are advantages of shopping in person.

"You get one-on-one customer service," she said. "Employees can help establish your needs. Online, you have to know what you want."

At American Eagle, the online store serves as more of an extra resource for store customers.

"There is some additional merchandise and longer and bigger sizes," Megan Kane, AE assistant manager, said. "It is basically for sizes."

Kane said shopping online doesn't hurt the Manhattan store because it benefits the company as a whole. However, she said she still sees advantages in coming to the store.

"You can try it on and see the merchandise up close," she said.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Infantry from the Army's 10th Mountain Division have crossed from Uzbekistan into northern Afghanistan to serve as a quick-reaction force in case of renewed Taliban resistance around the city of Mazar-e-Sharif, officials said Wednesday.

The force is comprised of no more than two dozen soldiers, the officials said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

One official said the numbers might be increased.

The 10th Mountain has had about 1,000 of its soldiers providing security at an air base across the border in southern Uzbekistan for several weeks, the officials said.

The rapid-reaction force apparently was not in the area when Taliban prisoners staged a bloody prison revolt Sunday. The CIA confirmed Wednesday that one of its officers, Johnny "Mike" Spann of Winfield, Ala., was killed in the riot. He was the first American known to be killed in Afghanistan since U.S. bombing began Oct. 7.

U.S. military personnel also are surveying airfields near Mazar-e-Sharif and Bagram, north of the Afghan capital, in anticipation of using them to expand the Kansas to house prisoners in private Colorado prison

TOPEKA — Kansas plans to keep as many as 100 of its prison inmates in a privately operated prison in Colorado until next spring.

Corrections Secretary Charles Simmons announced Tuesday that he has signed a contract with Corrections Corporation of America. The Nashville company runs the Kit Carson Correctional Facility in Burlington, Colo., about 20 miles west of the Kansas border along Interstate 70.

The contract represents the first between the state and a private company for placement of inmates outside Kansas.

Simmons said he made the decision because his department is running out of prison cells designed for medium-security inmates.

He said inmates would continue to be placed out of state until the department finishes work on an addition at its prison in Ellsworth. The addition will add 100 cells, each with space for two inmates.

Loss of control cause of summer helicopter crash

TOPEKA — A federal report on the fatal crash of a Topeka police helicopter last year says it was probably caused by a loss of control at low speed.

The report from the National Transportation Safety Board also said the pilot's inexperience might have been among several factors that played a role.

The June 13, 2000, crash killed pilot Jeff Howey, 37, and officer Charles J. "Joey" Bohlander Jr., 33. They were helping ground officers on what turned out to be a false alarm of a break-in at a home improvement store. The helicopter plunged hundreds of feet into a field.

Witnesses told the NTSB that the aircraft started spinning and the nose went straight down, according to the recently published report.

The report says the probable cause of the accident was the pilot's failure to maintain translational lift while maneuvering. Factors relating to this accident were the tail wind, low wind speed, low rotor rpm and the pilot's lack of overall experience in helicopters.

NATION IN BRIEF

By The Associated Press

Republicans back Bush's anti-terrorism legislation

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The House blocked a Democratic effort Wednesday to add billions to what President Bush wants for national security and aid to New York and moved toward approving a bipartisan $20 billion anti-terrorism package.

The largely party-line 216-211 vote was a victory for the Republican leadership and Bush, who has threatened to veto the legislation if extra money is added.

Most GOP lawmakers stayed behind the president despite pressure from unions, airports and other groups supporting the extra spending Democrats want.

"Our opponents across the aisle are trying to outbid us," said Rep. Pete Sessions, R-Texas.

"What this is about is wise and prudent spending of the taxpayers' resources."

The House vote prevented Democrats from offering three amendments that would have added $7.2 billion for hiring border guards, purchasing smallpox vaccines and other domestic security programs; $6.5 billion for defense; and $9.7 billion to help New York and other communities recover from the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Pakistani lottery winner staying in United States

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Powerball's newest millionaire says he will not return to his native Pakistan with his winnings. Ihsan Khan was the sole winner of a $53 million Powerball drawing Nov. 7. He opted for the lump-sum payout, which comes to nearly $32.5 million.

D.C. Lottery spokesman Bob Hainey said that when Khan claimed his prize earlier this month, he told lottery officials he felt more secure returning to Pakistan with the money. But since then, he has decided to stay in Arlington, Va.

The news that Khan would not leave the country caught lottery officials by surprise. They had fully expected to take Khan to the airport following Wednesday's check presentation.

Khan said he does not know where the story of him returning to Pakistan came from. Instead, the former taxi driver said he will stay in the Washington area and use the money to pay for his three sons' education and set up a foundation in his mother's memory.

NASA prepares for launch of mission to space center

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Two American astronauts — both of them military men — will leave a world of worry behind when they lift off Thursday for a six-month stay aboard the international space station.

Their nation is at war, and the space station program is under attack in Washington for mismanagement and huge cost overruns.

Daniel Bursch, a Navy captain and father of four, said he is grateful for all the work awaiting him 250 miles up.

"One thing on orbit that will be good for us is just staying busy, just being focused on something, that at least we know we're building something and being constructive," he said.

Space shuttle Endeavour is scheduled to lift off at 7:41 p.m. on NASA's sixth and final space station trip of the year. The space agency and the Air Force will be at high alert, with an unprecedented level of security, to guard against possible terrorist attacks.

Paraguay native surprised by friendliness of American life

BY TINA DEINES
Kansas State Collegian

Americans are friendlier than international student Maria Zanotti-Cavazzoni, of Paraguay thought they were before arriving here.

Prior to coming to Manhattan, Zanotti-Cavazzoni said she viewed most Americans as distant toward one another.

She said she chose Kansas because of an agreement the state has with her country. She said one benefit of studying here is that she gets to pay in-state tuition.

One difference Zanotti-Cavazzoni mentioned between Kansas and Paraguay was family structure.

In Paraguay, it is not uncommon for immediate and extended family to live in the same town, while that is nearly unheard of in the United States.

She also noticed a difference in living standards between the two countries. Paraguay, she said, is not a first-world country like the United States.

School also is different, Zanotti-Cavazzoni said.

"The way they study is different here," she said. "The methods they use to teach are also very different here."

Zanotti-Cavazzoni said people here don't stay out as late compared to her country.

"There when people go out, they will party until very late," she said. "Here, they go home very early."

Also, she mentioned temperature as a big difference, as she is not used to the cold Kansas weather.

She said though the wind might blow cold, she is having a good time studying abroad.

"I think it's just the whole experience of living in another country and meeting students," she said.

Optometrist works more than 30 years in optometry business

TREVOR BURGESS
Kansas State Collegian

After being in the business for more than 30 years, optometrist Gary Young still is doing what he has wanted to do ever since the seventh grade.

Young said it was all those trips to the eye doctor at an early age that caused him to decide his profession, although he did have other options.

"My dad had a construction company, and he offered it to me to take over," Young said. "I worked with him for 12 summers during junior high, high school and college, so I knew what it was all about."

Young said that after he finished his first years of college at Fort Hays State University, he knew it wasn't the construction business he wanted to pursue.

is a series profiling professionals who have positions K-State students are working toward.

Who: Gary Young
Job: Optometrist

After Fort Hays, Young went to Pacific University in Forest Grove, Ore., and graduated from the College of Optometry in 1970. Young went to college for a total of six years and said that for him, it wasn't hard to find a job right out of college because of the time in which he graduated.

"That was right in the middle of the Vietnam War, so most of us graduated, and within a month or two, we were in the service," he said.

Young joined the U.S. Army and worked at Walter Reed Army Hospital in Washington, D.C., for two years. After that, he moved back to Manhattan in 1972, and he has been here ever since.

"I started in Westloop and had two different locations there for the first 19 years, and for the last 11 years now, we have been here," he said.

Young works at The Eye Doctors Optometrists, which is located on Anderson Avenue, where he is joined with three other Optometrists: Ronald Price, Sam Odle and Richard Schroeder. Along with the office in Manhattan, The Eye Doctors also have offices located in Topeka and Lawrence, and soon they will have an office in the Kansas City Metro area.

As most people would say

Optometrist Gary Young wanted to become an eye doctor when he was a child. He now works at Price, Young, Odle and Schroeder Eye Doctor Optometrists on Anderson Avenue. The Eye Doctors have offices in Topeka and Lawrence and soon will open offices in the Kansas City metro area.

Matt Stamey/Collegian

with any profession they choose, there are a few things Young would rather do than others.

"I would say, like most health care professionals, I think things have certainly changed as health care has become more involved," he said.

"We spend a lot more time filling forms out."

Young said he wishes he could focus more time on his patients and less time on the paperwork that goes along with it.

"I hate paperwork," he said.

Tourism-related industries experience layoffs, weaken vulnerable economy

BY MARTIN CRUTSINGER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The U.S. economy weakened further in October and November as factories continued to slash payrolls and airlines, and hotels struggled to cope with after-shocks from the terrorist attacks, the Federal Reserve said Wednesday.

The central bank painted a generally somber outlook of business conditions around the country since Sept. 11 and found only small signs of a potential rebound.

Analysts said the Fed survey, prepared for the central bank's last meeting of the year Dec. 11, virtually guaranteed an 11th cut in interest rates as the Fed continues to do what it can to combat the country's first recession in a decade.

"The Fed report highlighted how broad based the economy's problems have become from coast to coast," said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Economy.com.

The central bank has reduced its target for the federal funds rate, the interest that banks charge each other, 10 times this year, pushing it down to 2 percent, the lowest level in 40 years.

"Economic activity generally remained soft in October and the first half of November, with evidence of additional slowing in most regions outweighing signs of recovery in a few districts," the Fed said.

The report said manufacturing, which has lost more than 1 million jobs since the spring of 2000, continued to cut production and jobs.

The survey said trouble in manufacturing had spread to other sectors of the economy with airlines and other tourism-related industries particularly hard hit.

On Monday, the National Bureau of Economic Research officially ruled that the country was in a recession after a record 10-year economic expansion.

The Fed report did find a few hopeful signs, most notably in a record surge in auto sales in October, spurred by zero interest financing incentives.

But the survey found retailers growing more anxious about the Christmas holiday season in light of the sharp jump in unemployment. The jobless rate rose to 5.4 percent in October as 415,000 Americans were thrown out of work, the largest one-month total in 21 years.

The rising layoffs contributed to a fifth consecutive monthly drop in consumer confidence, the Conference Board reported this week.

Economists' expectations of further Fed rate cuts has increased in light of comments this week by various Fed officials. Fed board member Laurence Meyer said it would have been misguided for the central bank to hold back on rate cuts simply because rates already have been pushed to such low levels. The Fed has cut rates in three half-point moves just since Sept. 11.

William Poole, president of the St. Louis Fed, said in a separate speech, also Tuesday, that "the only stopping place is zero and if going to zero is constructive, then we ought to do it."

Analysts say the Fed, which already has pushed interest rates down to the lowest level since September 1961, will keep cutting rates until there is solid evidence the economy has stabilized and begun to rebound — something expected to occur early next year.

Some economists said the December rate cut might be only a quarter percentage point, especially if Congress has ended its current stalemate and passed an economic stimulus package.

Glen Hubbard, head of President Bush's Council of Economic Advisers, said Wednesday that the stimulus plan put forward by the administration would create 300,000 additional jobs and boost economic growth by one-half percentage point next year.

The Fed survey reported that the rising number of layoffs had taken the pressure off wages and that the weak economy was keeping a lid on inflation generally with prices of cars, gasoline and computers all dropping during the survey period.

There are an estimated 920,000 people with HIV/AIDS in North America, according to aidsaction.org. The 2000 Kansas Census reports there are about 40 known cases in Riley County and about 40 cases in Geary County.

Victor Force, executive director of the Regional AIDS project, said there might be many more infected, but they might not be aware of it.

In the spirit of World AIDS Day on Saturday, if you have participated in risky sexual behaviors, you might want to be tested for HIV/AIDS.

Those who should be tested are anyone who has had sexual interaction with multiple partners, has used IV drugs or been with a partner who used IV drugs, a partner who was known to be HIV positive or anyone who feels as if they might be at risk, said Kathy Dicky, nursing supervisor for Riley County Health Department, said.

Dicky said those who participate in risky sexual behavior should be tested every six months.

Force said anyone who is sexually active should be tested, because not all partners are honest about their sexual histories.

Testing can be completed at Lafene Health Center and Riley County Health Department. The test consists of drawing about a $20 blood sample. Dicky said pre- and post-counseling comes with the test. It takes about 14 days to get the results, and the patient must come in person to receive the results.

Take some time to be tested. It can keep you from spreading this deadly disease.

Followers just as essential as leaders in group efforts

Editor,

K-State is fortunate to have many leaders in a variety of positions across campus. The diversity in these positions and the people who hold them ensure that everyone at K-State has the opportunity to take on a leadership role that fits their personality.

Some people are needed at the forefront of each organization, leading members towards their goals. But for each leader out front, at least one is needed among the general membership to serve by example and support. These people are often thought of as followers, but followership is an essential part of the leadership relationship. Followers give leaders permission and support.

Each year, Blue Key Leadership Honor Society holds a leadership symposium to honor campus leaders. The theme for this year's symposium is, "Leading with Humor."

Humor and the relationships it helps to form are essential to leadership and allow people in all types of leadership positions to work together and accomplish more.

This week, Blue Key recognizes campus leaders pointed out by their fellow students. At the same time, we encourage K-Staters to look for and thank the silent leaders in their groups and organizations who work behind the scenes to make our university the best.

Blame game

Frivolous lawsuits abuse right to utilize courts

With Christmas fast approaching, parents rush their children to the mall, hurrying little Johnny onto Santa's lap. And then, that harrowing moment of childhood arrives: Johnny gets a little too playful, yanking old Santa's beard, stripping Santa of his identity and Johnny of his innocence.

What is a parent to do in such a moment of turmoil? Why, sue the mall and St. Nick, of course.

A patron of Disneyland did just that, claiming their child suffered emotional distress when the youth saw Mickey Mouse out of character and realized he was just a normal person.

Running low on funds during the holiday season? Try your hand at suing your creditors. A man from San Rafael, Calif., is suing American Express and Discover for losses he incurred while gambling on the Internet. After all, if the credit cards did not grant him those cash advances, he wouldn't have gambled that money away, right?

If it's your seasonal employment that is causing you grief, maybe a lawsuit is just what your evil employer needs. The New York Daily News reported a city worker is suing due to psychological stress inflicted when seeing a rat in a tunnel under the Hudson River. Rats in tunnels. Inconceivable.

These examples might seem laughable, but sadly, are actual lawsuits, according to the March 2001 issue of the American Legion. Such cases are welcomed by lawyers who might've been otherwise unemployed. America, which consists of only 5 percent of the world's population, employs 70 percent of the world's lawyers.

America's inmates must realize this, since litigation has become a favorite hobby in recent history. In Ohio alone, more than 800 inmate lawsuits can be expected in a year. Such lawsuits have cost the state close to $2 million to defend www.ug.state.oh.us/presrel/frivolous.htm.

While filing a lawsuit might cost the litigant less than $200, defending one can cost thousands. Thankfully, nearly half the states in the country are not taking this meritless litigation lying down. Arizona passed frivolous inmate legislation in 1994, which resulted in a 35 percent decline in filings in the following year.

Such legislation punishes inmates who file meritless suits by taking away privileges, such as loss of television, radio or recreational time. Prisoners also are expected to pay court costs and attorney fees if their suits are deemed frivolous.

But what kind of punishment is given to those free citizens who choose to abuse the legal system?

The federal and state legislative branches are working on laws to curb the instances of such lawsuits. In Florida, a law has been passed that says if any citizen who files — and loses — five lawsuits in five years will be barred from suing again until they hire an attorney or receive special permission from a judge, according to the St. Petersburg Times.

However, such laws are prone to fail once the lawyers enter the picture. If a lawyer concludes a controversial case might make him or her some fast money, the lawyer is likely to offer his or her services.

Fast cash, little effort — it's the new American Dream.

It is true that the majority of the population wouldn't think of suing McDonald's because its coffee was "too hot." Yet, there seems to be an emerging mentality, whose mantra is "Pass the Blame." The new American litigant would rather put themselves on display for public ridicule than to hold themselves accountable for their actions.

Not all of life's experiences are pleasant. That's an understatement. But these American litigants need to stand behind their actions. Gain experience and faith in oneself, and lessen the inflated importance of St. Nick and Mickey.

Self-praise should be earned, not become addictive ego boost

"I am good enough. I am smart enough, and doggone it, people like me." Stuart Smalley's well-known daily affirmation, along with his pastel sweaters and hokey smile, are — deservedly — the source of gaffaws and giggles nationwide.

Al Franken's Saturday Night Live skit pokes fun at those who must inflate their own egos with ever-increasing frequency.

Laugh all you want. But the mantra of Stuart Smalley has become a scary reality for Americans everywhere. The reality? The unnecessary and rather frightening misuse of the concept of self-esteem.

Self-esteem is an idea with a good heart as its core. It reminds people to love themselves. With self-esteem, we are confident enough to laud ourselves for winning those little daily battles.

Indeed, self-esteem has its place in life. It gives a certain brightness to each smile and a poised shimmy to each stride. We can meet new people, chat with potential bosses and go to bed happier, more confident people.

However, wesomehow have gotten too caught up in the act of patting our own backs. American society has started to treat self-esteem like a basic human need that everyone should have — no matter what. I almost can imagine some blue-haired lady doling out equal helpings of self-appreciation on the cafeteria trays of life.

This lady needs to repave her career path. Self-esteem is not an honor deserved by everyone all the time. It is not a given human right. Our lazy society needs to learn that self-esteem is a reward that must be earned.

Everybody has done something to merit self-pride at some point in time. Reasons to be proud include doing anything to better oneself or others. Picking up a stray puppy, earning a good grade or volunteering at a shelter all are commendable activities. We should be satisfied with ourselves when we take beneficial actions.

Yet, there are times we deserve to be critical of ourselves. Sometimes our cool factor reaches low points. We might neglect a friend or family member who needs a hand. Maybe we have let partying lower performance in school, work or sports. When stuff like this takes over our lives, we feel like we suck, and deservedly so.

Nothing should be a better motiva-tional tool than your own goals for yourself. If you think you have been a nasty and irresponsible person lately, you probably are right. At times like this, you definitely do not deserve a Stuart Smalley moment until you get off your duff and make some changes.

A main problem with the overgrowth of self-esteem is how we treat our children. American education system officials often worry about students' feelings when they should be concerned about education.

One Kansas public school district was considering instituting a phased system for basic classes. Students would be grouped by ability in foundational subjects like mathematics and English.

The proposal created an outcry. Parents whined about the possibility of their children developing injured egos because they are not math whizzes.

I have never heard of anything more ridiculous. I am sorry, ma'am, but if Billy ain't no good at readin', he and his classmates probably have already noticed. The children who cannot read well or perform addition already have to miserably sit through classes that are not helping. At the same time, the brighter students are becoming increasingly bored and frustrated with classes that do not meet their needs.

If parents really were concerned about the well-being of their children, they would stop the feeling and get going with the learning. Grouped students have the advantage of learning at a collectively comfortable pace. Behavioral problems in the classroom might be reduced, which only will add to the amount of material covered daily.

Children need to learn to deal with the realities of life. When they grow up, they will have to understand to use their own personal abilities and talents to achieve success. Treating children like they are all the same will not help them.

The same goes for us. Although that warm, fuzzy "I rock" feeling is addictive, we cannot depend upon it at all times. Sometimes we just have to not do our best in a situation — or four. That is when we should give ourselves a swift kick in the butt.

Other times, we rule. That is when, instead of kicking ourselves, we should kick back and bask in the glow of our own sweet glory.

Washburn law professor: Muslims confused following attacks

BY JENNIFER FARR
Kansas State Collegian

Calling the Sept. 11 attack a complex and difficult situation, Ali Khan, professor of international law and human rights at Washburn University Law School, spoke at the K-State Student Union on Tuesday.

His discussion, "Muslims Here and Abroad," brought forth the Muslim point of view that he said has been overlooked since the tragedy.

Khan said many Muslims, in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks, are in utter confusion of what to do about the situation. He said that because of the 19 people who have conducted this activity, all Muslims have been marked as terrorists, and this interpretation is wrong.

"There are 1 billion Muslims abroad and in the United States who are enjoying their lives, but because 19 people learned to fly and destroyed two great towers, we are all marked for this act," Khan said.

"A Muslim cannot even walk around with a ballcap on without being looked at as a terrorist, for people cannot tell if they are terrorists or a common person. What people need to realize is, not all Muslims are terrorists. But how are they supposed to tell when the terrorists are regular people themselves?"

During the discussion, Khan said he disagreed with President Bush's current plan to bomb Afghanistan and the idea that countries that don't support America are its enemies. He said Bush's current doctrine will not survive because there is no possible way to deter full global terrorism.

"The President has acted as if there is a war," Khan said. "We are saying to the President, 'You are the executor, the judge, and I think the Constitution does not permit that.' Upon reflection, I think it is dumb to try to separate good and evil, and I think the doctrine implemented by Bush will not survive."

Michael Dengerink, junior in business management, said he agreed with Bush's actions, because when those accused do not come forward and so many people have died, someone must pay.

"I think it is a great concept to allow the Global Courts to handle the problem and not taking power into our own hands, but when those who are accused are not coming forward to testify — what are we to do?" he said.

However, Talat Rahman, professor of physics, agreed with Khan and said the United States should not take its power too lightly. She said eliminating the current terrorist leaders, then going back to where our foreign policy was will not solve the situation.

"It is not just Osama bin Laden committing these acts," Rahman said.

"Supposing we freeze all current terrorist activity and then go back to our current foreign policy, we will not solve the problem, but inevitably make it worse."

Manhattan resident Pedro Armesto said what America needs to do is to have some notion of peace before anything further can happen.

"Peace is the fruit of justice," Armesto said.

"If you don't have justice, you don't have peace. Before we take any actions, we have to try to regain peace."

Nicole Donnert/Collegian

Ali Khan, professor of international law and human rights at Washburn University Law School, spoke during a K-State Student Union lecture Wednesday afternoon. Khan discussed the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and their effects on Muslim Americans. "A Muslim cannot even walk around with a ballcap on without being looked at as a terrorist, for people cannot tell terrorists or a common person," Khan said. "What people need to realize is, not all Muslims are terrorists."

Tutor helps Junction City 9th-graders GEAR UP

BY NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

Corey Williamson, junior in kinesiology, is going back to high school.

This time, though, as a tutor for GEAR UP, a program that encourages students from low-income families to go to college.

"It's pretty cool," Williamson said. "You end up becoming more than just a tutor for them — you become someone else they can talk to."

Williamson spends three days a week at Junction City High School helping ninth-graders from low-income families with their studies.

"They are more happy when they are doing well," he said.

The program serves 281

Junction City freshmen and 548 seventh and eighth graders. It began in Junction City, and nationwide, three years ago for several reasons.

According to GEAR UP records, studies found that students — even high achievers — from low-income families were five times less likely to attend college than their peers.

They also found that most of these children's parents didn't feel they had the information to encourage and guide their children toward higher education.

Therefore, GEAR UP began in order to provide information about college to these parents, children and teachers.

"There are many roles we have to fill," said Cyndi Hermocillo-Legg, project coordinator.

The ninth-grade students now in the program first started in the seventh grade.

"We will follow them all the way to graduation," Hermocillo-Legg said.

Because one of GEAR UP's goals is to make students aware of college, having college students as tutors is perfect, she said.

"Students can come and ask me questions, but when they ask a college student, it makes it that much more realistic," she said.

Many of these students are first generation college-bound students, she said, so getting an introduction to college life is important.

"Any exposure to college life is good exposure," Hermocillo-Legg,

The mentors give them college information and take them to see college campuses, such as K-State's.

They also, of course, help them with their school subjects. Hermocillo-Legg said they already are seeing improvements in the students' scores and retention.

For example, the ninth-grade students took a math pretest before entering high school. The average score was an 18 percent. After mentors worked with the students, they took the test again. This time, the average score was an 87 percent.

"It makes it worth it," Williamson said. "Knowing you are a part of helping do that, you can't help but get a little satisfaction out of it."

BOWL BIDDING

K-State waits for invite; Wildcat players, coaches prepare for postseason

BY DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

It might be a warm Christmas for K-State fans if everything goes as expected.

The Wildcats (6-5) seem to be the frontrunners for a bid to the Insight.com Bowl, scheduled for 4 p.m. Dec. 29 at Bank One Ball Park in Phoenix, Ariz.

However, a decision won't likely be made until at least Sunday or Monday, after the Big 12 Championship game is played between Texas (10-1) and Colorado (9-2) — although the agreement could conceivably hold off until Dec. 9, when the other league title games across the nation are completed.

"Our status, and the feedback that I have received, is that it's really in the hands of our conference," head coach Bill Snyder said Tuesday. "I think that at the closure of this weekend, there will be some movement, and that's probably just projection and guesswork."

Bowls with Big 12 tie-ins have yet to extend invitations to Big 12 schools at the conference's request. This wait — often termed the "K-State rule" — is being mandated to protect teams from instances such as 1998.

After losing the Big 12 title game to Texas A&M, K-State fell out of both the national championship and BCS picture, and — since the higher-tier bowls with Big 12 tie-ins already had extended invitations — the 11-1 Cats dropped all the way down to the Alamo Bowl.

"It took a little wind out of our sails, and I think a lot of people were pissed off," linebacker Ben Leber said. "And that carried over. You've got 110 guys that are pissed off, and it's not just going to get better overnight."

It didn't, and No. 4 K-State fell to unranked Purdue, 37-34.

In retrospect, Snyder said he applauds the fact that the Big 12 is now taking action to prevent a repeat of three years ago.

"It's all relative to following the '98 season, that there is potential with the teams that we presently have in the championship game that if a lot of decisions are made beforehand, something could happen to one of those teams," Snyder said, "obviously, the team that would lose the championship ball game — and could get into that freefall position."

"The conference wants to prevent that, and I appreciate that, because we went through it, and it's not a comfortable place to be. So it's kind of on hold until that takes place, and there is some caution from the conference office to not jump the gun in that respect, and I think everybody, to my knowledge at this point in time, is playing by the rules."

Snyder said it will be important for the Big 12 — which has eight bowl eligible teams and only seven bowls with conference ties — to get at least two programs in the BCS, and that remains a strong possibility.

The winner of the Texas/Colorado game is a lock in the Fiesta Bowl, which has a Big 12 tie-in, and Nebraska is a top candidate for an at-large berth in the Sugar Bowl.

Associate athletics director hired for K-State operations

Casey Scott, a 1977 graduate of K-State, has been hired as the school's associate athletics director for operations, Wildcat director of athletics Tim Weiser announced Tuesday.

Scott, who has worked with Weiser at Wichita State and Colorado State, most recently served as the associate athletics director for external operations with the Rams, where he oversaw marketing, fund-raising, ticketing and special-event operations.

Scott, who led operations for the annual Rocky Mountain Showdown football game between Colorado State and Colorado, spent four years at Colorado State and 12 years at Wichita State after writing for the Wichita Eagle from 1977 to 1985.

Scott, 46, also served as the Collegian's sports editor and managing editor during his college career.

California senior prepster inks with Wildcat golf team

Julie Kim, a senior at Palos Verdes Peninsula High School, in Rancho Palos Verdes, Calif., is the newest member of the K-State women's golf team, head coach Kristi Knight announced Tuesday.

Kim posted seventh-place finishes at the American Junior Golf Association Abilene Reporter News Junior Classic and the AICA Marisco Funds Colorado Junior Roundup earlier this season.

The prepster also shot rounds of 74 and 79 to place sixth at the Los Angeles Junior Golf Championship.

Bennett ready to tackle head coaching duties elsewhere

BY DEREK BOSS

Kansas State Collegian

Phil Bennett has been an assistant all his life.

K-State's defensive coordinator is in his 22nd year of coaching at the collegiate level — with programs such as LSU, Texas A&M and Oklahoma highlighting his track record — but he's never been a head coach.

It might be his time.

Bennett said Tuesday he's been contacted by more than a couple interested colleges in need of a head coach next season.

"I've said this before, and I don't feel bad in saying this — I've tried to prepare myself to be a head coach," Bennett said. "Whether it's going to happen, I can't say, but I've prepared myself for the opportunity. For me to sit here and say that I haven't would be a lie, so I'm going to look at some things from that point."

No interviews have taken place as of Tuesday, but Bennett said discussions are pending, although he would not reveal the names of the interested schools.

"There's nothing that I can really say, but it's that time of year," he said. "I've traveled this road before, and I think just keeping your options open and your mouth shut at this time is probably the best thing I could do."

The most intriguing possibility might be the job at Southern Methodist, a Western Athletic Conference school outside Dallas, Texas, which would return Bennett to his native state, an area that he said is appealing.

He previously coached at two schools in the state — Texas A&M from 1979-81 and again in 1995-96, and Texas Christian on two occasions as well, 1982 and 1997 — and he has strong recruiting ties in Dallas, Central Texas and East Texas.

Another prospect surrounds the opening at in-state rival Kansas, but Bennett said that doesn't change the dynamics of his situation.

"Everybody specs of what situations are, but I don't know if it makes any difference," he said. "I'm sure KU will get a good coach."

However, Bennett said, the caliber of program really isn't the issue for him in entertaining head coaching offers.

"You always want to coach the best, but situations, the opportunity to win, the commitment — I've ran the gamut," he said. "I've coached in every major stadium against every major team just about in the country. I wouldn't put a prerequisite that it had to be top-of-the-line, but you always want to try to be in the best situation you can be in."

"I've been fortunate in my career, and I've said this before — I'm the luckiest guy in the world. Some people say, 'Well, you've been everywhere.' I've lived a full life of coaching that so many people don't get to do, and I've been around great players, great coaches, and I've learned so much that it would be hard to leave here, and it does have to be the right situation."

He said he has not spoken to his players about the situation, or his two children — Maddie and Sam, who he said love it in Manhattan — but he did plan a tentative meeting with head coach Bill Snyder on Tuesday.

Defensive coordinator Phil Bennett has helped K-State's defense become one of the nation's best. This postseason, Bennett is entertaining head coaching offers.

Bennett said everything is in its early stages, though. He chose to wait until the end of the season in order to not let his future situation be a distraction to this year's team — a decision which was especially evident after the Missouri contest.

"It just wasn't going to happen, because I'm so proud of them," he said. "I told 'em after the game, and I mean this — we've won 22 games in two years, two 11-win seasons, and I think I'm more proud of 'em right now than I've been since

Good teams still getting snubbed in latest Bowl Championship Series rankings

Defending the BCS has become a dangerous pastime these days.

When representatives from the Rose, Orange, Fiesta and Sugar bowls visit BYU football games, it wouldn't be surprising if they traded their usually colorful sports jackets for camouflage to hide from the BYU fans. The Cougar faithful are liable to throw them in the salt lake since their team is undefeated and unlikely to earn a bid to any BCS bowl, let alone the national championship Rose Bowl.

The same is true for any number of successful football programs.

Only Miami, assuming it defeats Virginia Tech on Saturday, has overwhelmingly earned a spot in the championship game. The Hurricanes are not only undefeated, but for the most part have dominated the competition. The same is not true for whatever team faces Miami in the Rose Bowl.

All in all, eight teams have a legitimate claim to a Rose Bowl berth. Even worse for the BCS, all eight teams are nearly equal in records and strength of schedule. Only one, though, will play for the national championship. The other seven will complain that the system is unfair, which has been the case ever since the BCS was conceived.

Since its first season, the BCS has been villainized for messing up college football.

Some people say the computer polls are ridiculous, which probably is true. Of the eight computer polls, five have different teams ranked No. 2. The consensus of the polls has Texas ranked third, but only two computers actually ranked the Longhorns third. The rest of the polls have Texas ranked anywhere from second to seventh. The only thing the computers agree upon is that Miami is No. 1, which a mere glance at the Canes' record could have determined.

Strength of schedule also is oft-criticized. When Colorado beat Nebraska, for instance, its strength of schedule actually weakened because that gave Nebraska a loss.

Despite all of this, though, the BCS is easily the best way to decide who plays for a national championship. Fans and sports-writers alike are screaming for a playoff system, but that actually could decrease the parity that is thriving in college football this season. Only the teams who made the playoffs would benefit. Sure, the conferences would disperse some of the income earned from television and increased bowl appearances for each playoff team, but the successful teams still would become richer and more successful.

The teams that didn't make the playoffs, though, would face a situation much like basketball's NIT (translation: No Interest Tournament). For some reason, teams and fans get excited about any bowl appearance. This season, for example, K-State fans seem to be enthused about a dot com bowl appearance despite the high expectations that have surrounded the Cats for the last five seasons.

A playoff system would eliminate that interest. All lower-tier bowls would just be non-playoff bowls.

Any other concoction to decide the national champion will run into the same problem as the BCS — a lot of teams that equally deserve a shot at a championship.

Nevertheless, fans still will scream for change, which highlights a bigger issue than ranking teams. For some reason, American fans refuse to accept anything other than No. 1. When Nebraska shared the national championship with Michigan, an outsider would have thought the world was going to end to read many newspaper columns. Did the situation ruin the season for either Nebraska or Michigan? Absolutely not. Both thought they had played championship seasons.

In the same way, BYU's success this season will not be lessened one iota if it doesn't play in the Rose Bowl. If the Cougars win the rest of their games, they still will sport a perfect season and a conference championship.

Just don't tell that to the BYU fans. And don't wear a brightly colored jacket to Utah.

STARSTRUCK

Students write, perform own musical

BY BECKY FISCHER
position Bachelor's State Collegian

What started as a couple of songs now is a full-fledged musical production.

"Star" was not a concept for writer Donald Lee, junior in psychology, until it was suggested to him.

"I just wrote a couple songs on the piano," Lee said. "My friend heard them and said I should incorporate the songs into a story. I hadn't thought of it, but it was something I wanted to try."

Once he got started on the musical, Lee said it was easy and fun to complete.

"With the two songs, I had a general idea about the storyline," he said. "The rest just flowed together. The songs fed into each other and told the story."

The story follows the journey of a normal guy, Jimmy Star, who wants nothing more than to become a star. It happens almost overnight. Through this instant fame, Jimmy eventually loses his family and friends. Drugs and other trials further complicate things, and Jimmy is left to consider what is really important in life.

"I got some of the idea from staying up too late and watching VH1's True Hollywood Story," Lee said. "There's all these stories about bands like Poison that start from nothing, reach stardom, fall apart and finally realize what's important. It's the classic tale of fame."

Fame is not something Lee is looking for with the musical, he said. In fact, writing musicals is something Lee said he didn't ever plan on doing.

"I've never considered a career in this," he said. "I don't really like musicals."

The concept behind musicals, though, is something Lee said attracts him.

"I like the idea of telling a story through music," he said. "I'd rather call 'Star' a music drama."

Lee said some drama entered his experience when he wrote to Stephen Schwartz ("Godspell," "Pippin") who then invited him to his office in New York to look over "Star."

"Maybe he just felt sorry for me, or something," Lee said. "But I saved money and went out there. He gave me some encouraging words, along with some tips. I'm really nervous about this because I'm new to it, but he's helped a lot."

Lee's background has helped, too, he said. Music has been a part of Lee's life since he was young.

"I've been playing the piano since I was 4 and the violin since I was 8," Lee said. "Music is a big part of my life. Writing those songs is what got this whole thing started."

As for writing stories, Lee said he also has some experience in the matter.

"I've written plays before," Lee said. "But, as with lots of people, they just sort of sit there because no one wants to put them on." Until now.

The KUKSU Independent Theater Organization was formed for the purpose of giving students the opportunity to bring their plays and musicals to the stage. Lee and a friend living in Lawrence formed the group as a way to bring together students from the University of Kansas and K-State who are interested in theater. The organization was formed just this summer, Lee said.

"We wrote up a constitution and are registered," Lee said. "Now we've just got to get out to people. I think the worst thing for art is to sit around gathering dust."

This is just another avenue for students to express themselves.

There is no cost for the shows this weekend, but donations are accepted.

"The money will go in another student to put on another production," Lee said.

"Star" and the KUKSU Independent Theater Organization are entirely student-based, Lee said.

"The costumes, set, choreography — everything about this musical has been created by students," he said. "I've been blessed by their dedication. They have so much going on, and most aren't even theater majors. The only reason they're doing this is

Donald Lee, junior in psychology, plays the piano for Lee Stadler, junior in music performance, and Peter Burghart, freshman in theater, while they rehearse at Manhattan Arts Center for the play "Star," written by Donald Lee.

Amanda Perkins, junior in finance, sings with characters in the play "Star" as they rehearse Tuesday night at the Manhattan Arts Center.

because they want to."

That's why Lisa Zecha, freshman in marketing and advertising, said she tried out for "Star."

"I did a lot of acting in high school," Zecha said. "It felt weird not to be doing it here. I saw a flier and ended up trying out the day before the production was to start. It was surprising to get the lead."

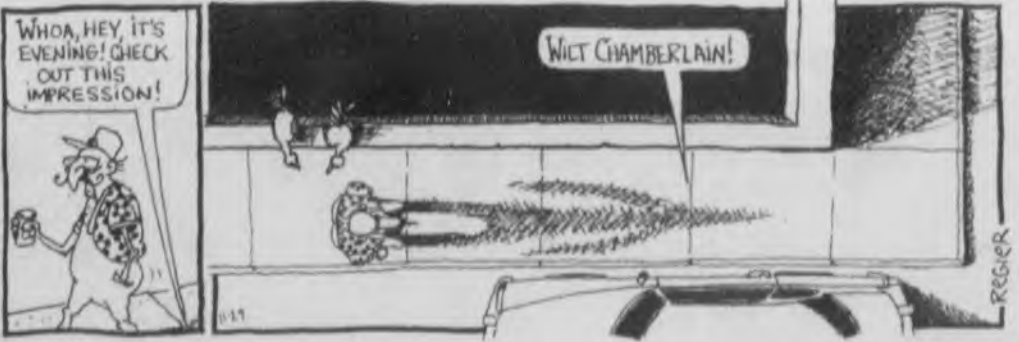

Besides playing the role of Lily, Jimmy's love interest, Zecha also got to try something new with "Star."

"I'm the choreographer, which is something I never thought I'd get to do," Zecha said. "It's fun. Donald's given me a lot of freedom."

Lee Stadler, junior in music performance, is another student doing something new with "Star."

CIA officer killed in northern Afghanistan

BY JOHN J. LUMPKIN
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Rioting prisoners killed CIA officer Johnny "Mike" Spann at Mazar-e-Sharif in northern Afghanistan, the agency said Wednesday. He was the first American killed in action inside the country since U.S. bombing began seven weeks earlier.

Officials recovered his body from a prison compound only after northern alliance rebels backed by U.S. airstrikes and special forces quelled an uprising by Taliban and al-Qaeda prisoners.

Spann, at the compound to interrogate prisoners, was caught inside when the riot began and had been missing since Sunday. The CIA provided few details of the circumstances of his death.

CIA Director George J. Tenet addressed agency employees Wednesday morning, saying Spann was an American hero and calling on fellow officers to continue the mission that Mike Spann held sacred.

"And so we will continue our battle against evil with renewed strength and spirit," Tenet said, according to a statement provided by the agency.

The flag outside CIA headquarters in McLean, Va., flew at half-staff.

President Bush said through a spokesman he regretted the death.

"The president understands that this battle began Sept. 11," White House press secretary

Ari Fleischer said. "There may be more injuries, there may be more deaths, and the president regrets each and every one."

Spann was a paramilitary trooper within the CIA's Directorate of Operations, the agency's spy service.

"Quiet, serious and absolutely unflappable, Mike's stoicism concealed a dry sense of humor and a heart of gold," Tenet said. "His brand of leadership was founded not on words, but on deeds — deeds performed in conditions of hazard and hardship."

Spann, 32, leaves a wife, two daughters and an infant son.

Originally from Winfield, Ala., Spann served in the Marine Corps as an artillery specialist, reaching the rank of captain before joining the CIA in June 1999.

"He wanted to be in the FBI or CIA. That's what he always wanted to do," said Billy Mack Spann, a distant relative in Alabama. "He got in the service and went from there."

"This week has really brought home the war to Winfield," family friend Tracy Estes said.

In Washington, D.C., Sen.

Richard Shelby, R-Ala., said he spoke to Mike Spann's wife, Shannon.

"She said that when I saw people, I should tell them her husband cared about America, cared about the future of America and cared about the security of Americans," Shelby said, fighting back tears.

Four other Americans, all military personnel, have been killed in connection with the fighting in Afghanistan. All died in accidents outside the country, two in a helicopter crash in Pakistan.

The CIA has been running covert operations in Afghanistan alongside the more public military effort. CIA officers are believed to have been providing weapons, money and intelligence to rebel groups opposing the Taliban and al-Qaeda, as well as interrogating prisoners captured during the fighting.

The prison riot began Sunday when hundreds of Arabs, Pakistanis and other non-Afghan prisoners captured after the fall of Kunduz, the Taliban's last stronghold in the north, stormed an armory for weapons.

Thousands of northern alliance fighters, aided by U.S. commandos and airstrikes, assaulted the compound, but the prisoners held out for days.

AMERICA RESPONDS

I've been here, just because of the adversity and what they've done to rectify all our wrongs.

"The kids understand. Their loyalty is to K-State, and mine is, too, and we don't ever want to separate that."

As for the chance he wouldn't coach the Cats in their ninth consecutive bowl appearance, Bennett said everything is up in the air.

"There's some situations I'm more interested in than others, and everything's very preliminary," he said. "Anything that I'd say would be pure spec, and I don't want to do that."

Senior free safety Jon McGraw said it probably would be a little distracting for that to occur, but the players want what is best for Bennett.

"He definitely will tell us when the time is right, and that leads me to believe that he's not close to making any real decisions," McGraw said, "because he hasn't talked to us about it yet."

Senior linebacker Ben Leber said Bennett, who has coached K-State to three straight Top 5 defenses in his three years in Manhattan, could even coach in the NFL — although he'll have a few anecdotes to take with him wherever he goes.

"It's almost like he's a perfectionist," Leber said. "Sometimes we complain on defense a little bit, because we're getting ready for plays that he's like, 'Now, they ran this play two years ago. They only ran it one time, but we've got to get ready for it.'"

"That's just the type of attitude that he takes and brings to work with him every day, and he's always willing to put in all the work to get us prepared and put us in the best situations. He's a hard worker, and he loves what he's doing."

But Bennett said he's come to the point where looking at head coaching jobs is something he feels he should do.

"Everything in life is about timing and opportunities, and I think it's a stage in my career — I'm 45 years old. I'll be 46 on Monday — that if the right opportunity arises, I think I could make somebody a good head coach."

"This is my first time acting," Stadler said. "I've always thought it would be fun to be somebody else. Plus, I get to yell at people, which is something else I'd like to do, but I don't because I'm too nice of a guy."

Stadler said Lee gave him a flier to try out when he was walking through McCain.

David McNeal, junior in painting, received his flier from Lee while working at Kinko's.

the championship team's going to go and Nebraska's sitting at No. 4 in the BCS. So to me, that's got to ensure that they would be in there," Snyder said.

"It would seem to me that they should, but I don't have anything to do with calling the shots. Stranger things have happened."

If the league does get two BCS bids, the rest of the Big 12 will be able to play itself out, as the Cornhuskers' at-large bid would allow there to be enough remaining bowls with Big 12 tie-ins (6) to satisfy the number of conference schools still eligible (6).

Texas Tech is the only other school reported in the Insight.com picture, and officials from the bowl said Saturday that K-State is a very attractive choice.

On Monday, the Insight.com invited No. 18 Syracuse (9-3) with its Big East tie-in, and should the Cats receive a bid as well, it would set up a rematch of the 1997 Fiesta Bowl, which K-State won 35-18.

Snyder said fan support and television exposure — both primarily money-driven — are the two main attractions to bowl officials. K-State's propensity to travel well, drawing more than 40,000 to the '97 Fiesta, is a plus, but the lack of TV sets in the state of Kansas could be a disadvantage.

With those elements balancing out, in effect, Snyder said other factors would have to come into play, but there's nothing his players can do at this point.

"It's just one of those things that if you don't have control over it, you're probably in a posture to waste some time," Snyder said. "If you've got plenty of time and that's the way you want to waste it, go ahead. But they've got school, they've got a lot of things — they'll think about it, and they'll talk about it — but there just isn't anything that they can do about it right now until the time comes."

Leber said he is just fine with that.

Today and Friday will be the team's first practices since the Missouri game, and he's been trying not to worry about much of anything lately.

"When you put in as much time as we do up here, just sitting on the couch knowing that you could be at practice right now is enough to fill my time," Leber said. "Just getting a chance to relax mentally and physically is all I need."

Meanwhile, senior tailback Josh Scobey admits he's been doing a little thinking about the Cats' bowl possibilities.

"Hopefully, it could be Insight. Independence, you know, whichever one," Scobey said, "because we know we're going to have good competition in both bowls. So either one of those would be pretty fine to me."

delivery of humanitarian relief supplies, officials said.

Bagram's airfield eventually might be used to launch combat operations, they said, although it was not clear whether that would be by strike aircraft like Air Force F-15s or by ground troops.

Several hundred Army and Air Force special operations forces have been inside Afghanistan for weeks, working in small teams linked to opposition forces in northern and southern parts of the country.

The only other U.S. ground troops known to be in Afghanistan are Marines setting up a base near the southern city of Kandahar.

More Marines and equipment arrived at the base Wednesday, bringing the number to between 750 and 800, Pentagon spokeswoman Victoria Clarke said. The Pentagon has said that number might increase to about 1,100 Marines, whose purpose is to deny southern escape routes for Taliban and al-Qaeda fighters.

The Marines are the only substantial U.S. ground force in Afghanistan, although the Pentagon has not ruled out eventually putting more Army troops there if the approach to rooting out al-Qaeda and Taliban leadership fails. For now, the Pentagon is content to seek intelligence from local Afghans on the enemy's whereabouts and to bomb the caves, tunnels and other facilities in which they might be hiding.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld alluded to the possibility of more ground forces Tuesday when he visited the Tampa, Fla., headquarters of U.S. Central Command, which is managing the war effort.

"Our efforts, of course, will be shifting from cities at some point to hunting down and rooting out terrorists where they hide," he said. "This is difficult work. It's dangerous work."

Pentagon officials, meanwhile, said leaflets dropped by American planes over Afghanistan are helping persuade some Taliban troops to give up their fight.

"We're happy about that," Rear Adm. John Stufflebeem told a Pentagon news conference.

Stufflebeem said planes continue to drop leaflets with a number of messages, including those giving information on humanitarian aid, wanted posters on Taliban and al-Qaeda leaders and some to prompt defections in the few remaining parts of the country where fighters still are resisting opposition forces.

"We are starting to see some success from those," Stufflebeem said. "In having interviews with those who are detained, there is information that is coming forward that they are having a positive effect."

The Pentagon also reported that U.S. airstrikes damaged a compound southeast of Kandahar believed used by senior Taliban or al-Qaeda figures but it was unclear whether any were killed.

"They had a confluence of intelligence which led us to believe there was senior leadership in the building," Clarke said. "We do not have names. We don't have a sense of exactly who was in there. We do not have any sense that Omar was there," she said referring to Taliban head Mullah Mohammed Omar.

Stufflebeem said about 10 bombs dropped from an Air Force B-1B bomber struck the compound.

rates and a target price system, old policies that tended to pay producers when they had a crop, but often provided little if any assistance when producers had no crop to harvest.

"That was why we went to a guaranteed direct payment that producers could count on — even if they had no crop to harvest," Roberts said, adding that he thinks the Democratic measure will increase production as well as problems with competition in the world market.

Some farm groups are concerned that there will be less money available for their subsidies if Congress waits until next year to reauthorize the programs.

"It's time to provide some certainty and stability to our producers," said Bob Stallman, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation.

Roberts criticized farm and commodity organizations for supporting the Democratic measure, saying he and other Republicans always have supported these groups, but now they are acting like their best friends are members who have never voted for a farm bill in their entire careers.

The measure faces a series of amendments on the Senate floor, including the GOP subsidy plan and a move by environmentalists to shift billions in crop subsidies into conservation programs.

Both the Senate bill and one passed by the House in October would cost about $170 billion over the next 10 years, the ceiling set in this year's congressional budget agreement. The Senate legislation would have to be renewed in five years.

To win approval from the Senate committee's Southern Democrats, Chairman Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, dropped his effort to cut payments to big grain and cotton farms, added money for rice and peanuts and offered new subsidies for lentils and chickpeas.

Veneman raised concerns about proposed new subsidy programs that are in both the House and Senate bills. The payments, triggered when commodity prices fall below certain levels, could exceed U.S. subsidy limits in an international trade agreement, Veneman said. If that were to occur, the bills would require the department to cut payments.

Veneman also criticized the new dairy program in the Senate bill that would fix the prices farmers receive for a portion of their milk.

JC Penney department store has set up their catalog online for the convenience of customers.

Kathy Jones, catalog supervisor, said she has seen an increased popularity in online orders.

"More and more people are ordering online," she said. "We give them the option of having it delivered to their home or coming into the store."

The Web site, www.jcpenney.com, features a holiday shopping guide, pre-holiday sale and a gift finder.

Jones said she thinks the increase in online shopping is a result of our hectic society.

"It's because of our busy lifestyle," she said. "You can order in the middle of the night in your pajamas."

season at the Manhattan Town Center are Fields of Fair Winery, Hickory Farms and Day-to-day Calendars.

Raynor said some of the businesses come every year and others pick and choose. That, he said, is up to the individual businesses.

Actual store locations, Raynor said, aren't as easy to get as booth or cart locations.

"It depends on whether there are vacant stores at the time or not, but booths and cart locations are available throughout the year," he said.

Raynor said there are temporary merchants in the mall throughout the year, but November and December are the most prominent time for such businesses.

"Our customers are given opportunities they don't always get with these vendors," Raynor said. "That's what this time of gift giving is about — uniqueness."

Brown said his glass creations definitely make unique gifts, and his location makes them easily accessible.

"The fun thing is, some people take longer to pick a piece out than it takes me to make it. They want to make sure they have the perfect one," he said.
